denary (den'g-ri), a. and n. [< L. denarius, containing ten: see denarius.] 1. a. Containing ten; tenfold.

The symbol 40 in our denary scale represents ten times four . . . generally, the binary scale would call for about three and a half times as many figures as the denary.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 484.

II. n.; pl. denaries (-ris). 1. A division by tens; a tithing: as, "tythings or denaries," Holiness.

Centenaries that are composed of denaries, and they of units Str. X. Dugby, Supp. to Cabala, p. 245. (Latham).

2. A denarius.
An hundredth denaries, or pieces of silver coins.
J. Udell, On Mat. xix.

denationalization (dē-nash'gū-nl-i-sā'shon), n. [= F. denationalisation; as denationalise + -ation.] The act of denationalizing, or the condition of being denationalized. Also spelled denationalisation.

Mt. Chase, whose creed on slavery was in one word Denationalisation G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, I 139.

denationalise (dē-nash'gū-nl-i-z), v. t.; pret. and pp. denationalized, ppr. denationalising. [= F. denationaliser; as de-priv + nationalise.] 1. To divest of nationality, or of existing national relations or rights; subvert or change the nationality of, as a ship, a person, a people, or a territory, by change of flag, connection, or allegiance; give a new national character or relation to.

Another curious feature of the denationalising character of the Federal system in France is found in that the King of England was the real governor or feudal sovereign of nearly half of the present territory of France during almost a century. Stodd., Stud. Mod. Hist., p. 148.

The Paris Journal, "La France," which wrote "We are Europe;" and which had appealed for subscriptions in aid of the denationalised Dances Lois, Bismarck, I 449.

2. To divest of national scope or importance; limit to a particular locality; render local: as, to denationalise slavery or polygamy.

They [the Republicans] agreed . . . that the virgin soil of our territories should be unpopulated by slavery, and that this crime against humanity, and plague of our politics, should be denationalised. N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 202.

3. To deprive of national limitations or peculiarities; widen the relations, scope, or applicability of; make cosmopolitan.

The object is to construe a belief in its most inclusive, not exclusive, acceptation, . . . to denationalise a purely local faith by making it as universal as the limits of the world and of humanity.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 84.

Also spelled denationalize.
denaturalize (dē-nat'g-rl-i-z), v. t.; pret. and pp. denaturalized, ppr. denaturalising. [< de-priv + naturalize.] 1. To render unnatural; alienate from nature.—2. To deprive of naturalization or acquired citizenship in a foreign country.—3. To deprive of citizenship; denationalize; expatriate.

Denaturalizing themselves, or, in other words, . . . publicly renouncing their allegiance to their sovereign, and . . . enlisting under the banners of his enemies.
Prescott, Ford, and Lee, Int.

denay (dē-nā'), v. t. [< ME. denayen, a var. of deneyen, deny: see deny. The form denay in mod. use is prob. in simulation of say.] To deny; refuse.

What were those three,
The which thy proffered curst denay?
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 87.

Let not wond'ring be denay'd, Old Play.

denay (dē-nā'), n. [< denay, v.] Denial; refusal.

My love can give no place, hide no denay.
Shak., T. W., II. 4.

dendrachate (den'dra-kāt), n. [< Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + ἀχράς, agate: see agate.] Arborescent agate; agate containing figures resembling shrubs or parts of plants. Commonly called moos-agate.

Dendragapus (den-drag'g-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + ἀγρῶς, love.] Same as Canace.
dendral (den'dral), a. [< Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + -al.] Of or pertaining to trees; of the nature of a tree. [Rare.]

The exquisite tracery of trees, especially of all such trees as that dendral child of God, the elm.
H. W. Beecher, Christian Union, Jan. 23, 1874, p. 72

dendranthropology (den-dran-thrō-pol'g-ij), n. [< Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + ἄνθρωπος, anthropology.] A supposititious system or theory that man has sprung from trees. [Darwin.] [Humorous.]

Although the Doctor traced many of his acquaintance to their prior allotments in the vegetable creation, he did not discover such symptoms in any of them as led him to infer that the object of his speculations had existed in the form of a tree. . . . He formed, therefore, no system of dendranthropology.
Southey, The Doctor, cxxv.

Dendraspididae (den-dras-pid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dendraspis (-pid-), the typical genus, + -idae.] A family of venomous African serpents, of the group Proteroglypha, represented only by the genus Dendraspis. They have a normal tail, ungrooved fangs, and postfrontals, and are closely related to the Elapidae, with which they are associated in one family by some authors. Also Dendraspidæ.

Dendraspis (den-dras'pis), n. [NL., < Gr. dēvdrov, tree, + ἀσπίς, asp.] 1. The typical genus of the family of the family Dendraspididae. The best-known species is Dendraspis angusticeps, the narrow-headed den-draspid. It is about 6 feet long, slender, and a good climber. Its color is olive-brown washed with green.

2. [L. c.] Pl. dendraspidæ (-pi-dēz). A serpent of this genus.

Dendroperiton (den-drē'p-e-ton), n. [NL., < Gr. dēvdrov, tree, + ἐπερίων, reptile: see herpetology.] A genus of fossil labyrinthine rinthodont amphibians, from the lower coal-measures of Nova Scotia; so called from being based upon remains consisting of teeth and bones found in the cavity of a sigillaria. It has been referred to a group Microsauria of the order Labyrinthodontia.

dendritiform (den'dri-form), a. [< Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + L. forma, form.] Resembling a tree; tree-like in form; arborescent; dendritic. Also dendritiform.

dendrite (den'drit), n. [= F. dendrite = Sp. dendrita = It. dendrite, < NL. dendrites, < Gr. dēvdrov, of a tree, tree-, < dēvdrov, a tree.] 1. A stone or a mineral on or in which are figures resembling shrubs, trees, or mosses. The appearance is often due to arborescent crystallization, resembling frost-work on window. The figures are most abundant on the surfaces of fissures and in joints in rocks, where they are attributable to the presence of the hydrous acid of manganese, which generally assumes such forms.
2. A complex crystalline growth of arborescent form, such as is common with metallic silver and copper.

dendritic, dendritical (den'drit'ik -i-kəl), a. [= F. dendritique = Sp. dendritico, < Gr. dēvdrov; as dendrite + -ic, -ical.] 1. Resembling a tree; tree-like; arborescent in form; dendritiform.

What were those three,
The which thy proffered curst denay?
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 87.

In these fine curves and strokes of dendritic sculpture a graceful syrian idyl might perchance be deciphered by the curious.
The Atlantic, LVIII. 264.

2. Marked by figures resembling shrubs, mosses, etc.: said of certain minerals. See dendrite.
dendritically (den-drit'ik-əl-i), adv. In a dendritic manner; as a tree: as, dendritically branched.

In some species [Bacteria] the zoogloia is dendritically ramified. E. Klein, Micro Organisms and Disease, p. 60.
dendritiform (den-drit'if-ōrm), a. [< NL. dendrites, dendrite, + L. forma, form.] Same as dendritiform. [Rare.]

Dendrobates (den-drob'g-tēs), n. [NL. (cf. Gr. dēvdrov, climb trees), < Gr. dēvdrov, tree, + βασις, verbal adj. (> βασις, mount), < βασις, go. Cf. acrobat.] 1. In herpet., a genus of South American tree-frogs, typical of the family Dendrobatiidae. D. maculatus is a species inhabiting Cayenne. Wagler, 1830.—2. In ornith., a genus of South American woodpeckers, of the family Psittacidae. Swainson, 1837.

Dendrobatiidae (den-drob'bat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dendrobates + -idae.] A family of firmisternal, salient, anurous amphibians, typified by the genus Dendrobates. They are without teeth, and have subnolindrical sacral diapophyses. The family contains a few species of tropical America and Madagascar, having the toes dilated at the end. Also called Hyleplandæ.

Dendrobium (den-drō'bi-um), n. [NL., < Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + βίος, life.] 1. An extensive genus of orchideaceous epiphytes, distributed through southeastern Asia from India to Japan, Australia, and the islands of the South Pacific.

Dendrobium Falcourtii

The species are very numerous, exceeding 300 in number, varying extremely in habit, some being little larger than the mosses among which they grow, while others are surpassed in height by few of the order. Upward of 80 species have been cultivated in hothouses for the beauty of their flowers.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Mulsant.

Dendrocalamus (den-drō-kal'g-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + ἀλάμνος, a reed.] A genus of arborescent grasses, distinguished from the bamboo (Bambusa) by a berry-like fruit. There are 9 species, all of the East Indies, some of which attain a height of over 100 feet. The stems of D. strictus, known in India as the male bamboo, are very strong and elastic, and are in general use for spear-handles, building purposes, and basketwork.

Dendrochelidon (den-drō-kel'i-don), n. [NL. (Bole, 1828), < Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + χελιδών, a swallow.] A genus of tree-swifts, of the family Cypselidae and subfamily Cypselinae, the type of which is D. bleekeri of Java, Sumatra, the Malay peninsula, etc.

Dendrochirota (den'drō-kī-rō'tē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dēvdrov, tree, + χειρῶν, lit. handed, < χείρ, hand.] A group (generally ranked as a family) of pedate holothurians, with dendritiform branching tentacles. It includes such genera as Proetus and Cucumaria, and is equivalent to the family Pachida. It is contrasted with Aplocheirota.

The holothurians . . . feed on the smaller marine animals, which, in the Dendrochirota, are carried to the mouth by means of the branched tree-like tentacles.
Claus, Ecology (trans.), I 290.

dendrochiroteous (den'drō-kī-rō'tus), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dendrochirota.

Dendrocitta (den-drō-sit'g), n. [NL. (Gould, 1833), < Gr. dēvdrov, a tree, + κίττα, citta, a chattering bird, the jay or magpie.] A genus of Asiatic tree-crows, frequently included in the genus Cypselinae. The Chinese D. sinensis is an example; there are several other species.

dendrocal, a. Same as dendrocalous.

Such flat worms as the Dendrocal Planarians.
Shupe, Brit., XVI. 606.

Dendrocoela (den-drō-sē'ls), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dendrocoelus: see dendrocoelus.] A prime division of turbellarian worms, forming a suborder of Turbellaria: contrasted with Rhabdocoela. They are characterized by a broad flat body, often with alined lateral margins, tentacular processes at the anterior end of the body, a muscular and usually protrusile pharynx, and an arborescent or dendriform alimentary canal, whence the name. They are aprotous and mostly hermaphrodite. There are two subdivisions of the group: Monogonophora, land and fresh water planarians, with a single sexual outlet, and Dugesiophora, mostly marine forms, with double sexual opening. There are several families. Commonly called planarians.

Polycelis (Leptopoda) longata, an aprotous dendrocoelous turbellarian or planarian (Planariidae), magnified.

dendrocoelous (den-drō-sē'lan), n. [dendrocoel + -ous.] One of the Dendrocoela; a planarian.

dendrocoela (den-drō-sē'la), a. Same as dendrocoelus. Huxley.

Dendrocoelomata (den-drō-sē-lō-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + NL. coelomata, q. v.] Sponges having branched extensions or dendritic diverticula of the archenteron. A. Hyatt, Origin of Tissue, p. 114.

dendrocoelomatic (den-drō-sē-lō-mat'ik), a. [dendrocoelomata + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Dendrocoelomata.

dendrocoelomic (den-drō-sē-lō-m'ik), a. Same as dendrocoelomatic.

dendrocoelus (den-drō-sē'lus), a. [dendrocoelus, < Gr. dendron, a tree, + koilos, belly.] Having a branched or dendriform intestine; specifically, pertaining to the Dendrocoela. Also dendrocoel and (properly) dendrocoele.

Dendrocoelum (den-drō-sē'lum), n. [NL., neut. of dendrocoelus: see dendrocoelus.] A genus of dendrocoelous turbellarians, of the family Planariidae, having lobed cephalic processes and a sheathed copulatory organ. D. lacteum is an example.

Dendrocolaptes (den-drō-kō-lap'tēs), n. pl. [NL., pl. of dendrocolaptes: see Dendrocolaptes.] In Merrem's classification of birds (1818), a group coextensive with the Pici, Picidae, or Piciformes, and Sarogathae of modern authors; the woodpeckers and wrynecks.

Dendrocolaptes (den-drō-kō-lap'tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + kolaptes, taken for κολαπτήρ, a chisel (taken in sense of 'pecker'), < κολάπτειν, peek with the bill, chisel.] The typical genus with Anas (which see), in which usage it covers an assemblage of about 50 current genera and 500 species. In Bolster's arrangement it includes the Furnariinae, Synalaxinae, and Colerinae forms, as well as the dendrocolaptes proper.

Dendrocolaptes (den-drō-kō-lap'tēs), n. pl. [NL., < Dendrocolaptes + -es.] The South American tree-creepers proper, or the hook-billed creepers, typified by the genus Dendrocolaptes. They have generally lengthened, slender, and curved bills, stiff acuminate tail-feathers, and the acrobatic habit of woodpeckers. Leading genera, besides Dendrocolaptes and its subdivisions, are Xiphorhynchus, Piccolaptes, Dendrocincla, Sittaecarus, Glyphorhynchus, and Figuerhynchus.

dendrocolaptes (den-drō-kō-lap'tin), a. [dendrocolaptes + -is.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the South American tree-creepers or hook-billed creepers.

Dendrocolaptes birds are not, strictly speaking, songsters. Nature, XXXIII 201.

Dendrocometes (den-drō-kō-mē'tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + κομήτης, hairy; see comet.] The typical genus of Dendrocometidae, containing sessile animalcules with indurated cuticle and many-branched tentacles. D. paradoxus is a parasite of fresh-water crustaceans.

Dendrocometidae (den-drō-kō-met'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dendrocometes + -idae.] A family of sub-fortial tentaculiferous infusorians, with simple animalcules, which are multitentaculate and have the tentacles branched.

Dendrocygnus (den-drō-sē'gyn), n. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + κύγνη, cut down trees, < dendron, a tree, + κύγνη, cut.] In ornith.: (a) A genus of tree-creepers, the Dendrocygnus. Swainson, 1837. (b) A genus of woodpeckers, like Picus major. Koch, 1816. (c) A genus of American woodpeckers, like Picus principalis; the ivory-bills. Bonaparte, 1838.

Dendrocygnus (den-drō-sē'gyn), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1837), < Gr. dendron, a tree, + κύγνη, cygnus, Gr. κύων, a swan; see cygnet.] A genus of arboricole duck-like geese; the tree-ducks. The bill is longer than the head, and ends in a prominent decurved nail; the lamellae do not project, and the small oval nostrils are subbasal. The legs are very long, the tibiae are denuded below, the tarsi are entirely reticulate, the hallux is lengthened, and the feet are adapted for perching. There are several species, of various warm parts of the world; the fulvous tree-duck (D. fulvus) and the autumnal tree-duck (D. autumnalis) occur in the United States along the southern border. D. arborea is a West Indian and D. cygnus an Australian species.

Australian Tree duck (Dendrocygnus cygnus).

dendrodentine (den-drō-den'tin), n. [dendron, a tree, + E. dentine.] That modification of the fundamental tissue of the teeth which is produced by the aggregation of many simple teeth into a mass, presenting, by the blending of the dentine, enamel, and cement, a dendritic appearance.

dendrodont (den-drō-dont), a. and n. [dendron, a tree, + E. dent.] a. Pertaining to the genus Dendrodont; having teeth consisting of dendrodentine, or presenting a dendriform or dendritic appearance on section.

Dendrodus (den-drō-dus), n. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + δοῦς (doos-) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil fish-like vertebrates, from the Devonian or Old Red Sandstone. It is generally referred to the ganoids, and placed in a family variously called Glyptodermidae, Holopeltidae, and Opiodermidae. Dendroeca (den-drō-ēk), n. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + εκα, house.] The most extensive and beautiful genus of American sylvioline warblers, of the family Americanidae, Sylvioidae, or Mniotiltidae. It is highly characteristic of the North American bird fauna, and is especially numerous in species and individuals in the eastern United States. Upward of 25 species, a large majority of the genus, inhabit North America. They are small birds, from 4 to 6 inches long, endlessly varied in coloration, migratory, insectivorous, and usually nesting in trees or bushes. The bill is conic, acute, of moderate length, and garnished with bristles; the wings are pointed and longer than the tail, which is almost always blotched with white on the inner webs; and the tarsus is longer than the middle toe and claw. See warbler. Also spelled Dendroica. G. R. Gray, 1842.

Dendroidea (den-drō-ē-ō), n. pl. [NL., < Dendroica + -idae.] A name of the American fly-catching warblers, derived from that of the largest genus. They are usually called Sylvioidae or Mniotiltidae (which see).

Dendroica (den-drō-ē-ā), n. [dendron, a tree, + οἶα, the earth.] In zoogeog., a prime zoological division or realm of the earth's surface, including Central America and the West Indies, south of the Anglo-American or Nearctic realm, and the tropical portions of South America. It is less comprehensive than the Neotropical region, since the latter includes all of South America. See Amphigea, 2.

Dendrogean (den-drō-ē-ān), a. Of or relating to Dendrogea.

dendrography (den-drog'ra-fī), n. [= F. dendrographie, < Gr. dendron, a tree, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] Same as dendrology.

Dendrohyrax (den-drō-hi-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + ὑράξ, hyrax.] A genus of the family Hyracidae, including the arboreal comies of Africa, such as D. arboreus and D. dorsalis. The molar teeth are patterned somewhat as in Palaotherium, the upper incisors being separated by a wide diastema, and the lower being tribosac. The vertebrae are: cervical 7, dorsal 21, lumbar 7, sacral 5, and caudal 10.

dendroid (den-drō'id), a. [= F. dendroide, < Gr. dendroideus, also contr. dendroideus, tree-like, < dendron, a tree, + ειδός, form.] Tree-like; dendriform; ramified or arborescent; branching like a tree.

dendroidal (den-drō'id-al), a. [dendroid + -al.] Same as dendroid.

Dendrolagus (den-drol-a-gus), n. [NL., < Gr. dendron, a tree, + λαγός, a hare.] A genus of kangaroos; the tree-kangaroos. They are adapted for arboreal life, having the tail less robust than that of the ground-kangaroos, and the limbs better proportioned, with stronger claws. They move in the trees by leaping. The species are peculiar to New Guinea and northern Australia.

Tree-kangaroo (Dendrolagus desmeti).

dendrolite (den-drō-lit), n. [= F. dendrolite, < Gr. dendron, a tree, + λίθος, a stone.] A petrified or fossil shrub, plant, or part of a plant.

dendrological (den-drō-lō-j'kal), a. [dendrology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to dendrology.

Dendrological science has met with a great, an almost irreparable, loss in the death of Alphonse Laville, the best-known and most successful student and collector of trees of this generation. Science, IV. 22.

Tree-creeper (Dendrocolaptes longirostris).

ical genus of South American tree-creepers, of the family Dendrocolapidae. The name was formerly used with much latitude, and was nearly equivalent to Dendrocolaptes, it is now more restricted in application. It is still an extensive genus, having as its type D. pignatarius, and being divided into sections called Dendrocopus, Dendroestates, Dendroplex, Dendronus, etc.

Dendrocolapidae (den-drō-kō-lap'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dendrocolaptes + -idae.] A family of South American non-ovine passerine birds; the tree-creepers. It is a very extensive group, highly characteristic of the Neotropical fauna, but its characters and limits are unsettled. The name is loosely synonydendrologist (den-drol'ô-jist), n. [< dendrology + -ist.] One who is versed in dendrology. dendrologous (den-drol'ô-gus), a. [< dendrology + -ous.] Relating to dendrology. dendrology (den-drol'ô-ji), n. [= F. dendrologie = Fr. dendrologia, < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + -logia, < lógos, speak: see -ology.] A discourse or treatise on trees; the natural history of trees. Also dendrography.

dendrometer (den-drom'ê-têr), n. [= F. dendromètre, < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + metron, a measure.] An apparatus for measuring the heights of trees. It consists essentially of a square board pivoted at one corner to a stake set up at a known distance from the tree to be measured. A sight on the board enables the operator to fix the instrument on a level with the base of the tree; then on sighting the top of the tree its height is ascertained from the position of a plumb-line and scale on the face of the board.

Dendrometridae (den-drô-met'ri-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + -metron, a measure, < metron, a measure, + -idae.] A group of geometrid moths, in some systems called a family, represented by such genera as Geometra, Abraxas, etc. The larvae are known as measuring-worms or loopers, from their mode of progression.

Dendromys (den-drô-mi'nis), n. pl. [NL., < Dendromys + -inae.] An Ethiopian subfamily of rodents, of the family Muridae, including a number of small mouse-like arboreal species. The genera are Dendromys and Stenomys.

Dendromys (den-drô-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + mys = E. mouse.] The typical genus of the subfamily Dendromyinae. It is characterized by grooved incisors, slender form, long scant

Tree-mole (Dendrophysa caudimaculata)

Dendrophryniscus (den-drô-fri-nis'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + fryniskos, a toad, + dim. -iscus: see Phryniscus.] A genus of tailless amphibians or toads, typical of the family Dendrophryniscidae.

Dendrotyx (den-drô'tiks), n. [NL. (Gould, 1845), < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + tyx, a quail.] A genus of American partridges; the tree-partridges. D. leucophrys, D. macrurus, and D. barbatus, of Mexico and Central America, are examples.

Dendrosauria (den-drô-sâ'ri-je), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + sauros, a lizard.] One of many names applied to a division of Lacertilla, or lizards, consisting of the Chamaeleontida or chameleons alone. Also called Vermilinguia, Rhoptoglossa, Chamaeleonida, etc.

Dendrosoma (den-drô-sô'mâ), n. [NL., < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + sôma, body.] The typical genus of Dendrosomidae, containing multitenaculate animalcules forming branched, naked, sessile colonies. It is one of the most remarkable forms of the whole infusorial class, resembling a polyp in many respects, and is the one compound or aggregate type among the suctorial or tentaculiferous infusorians. D. radicans, which grows on aquatic plants in fresh water, was originally described by Ehrenberg as a kind of sun-animalcule of the genus Actinophrys.

Dendrosomidae (den-drô-som'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Dendrosoma + -idae.] A family of suctorial tentaculiferous infusorians, typified by the genus Dendrosoma. The animalcules are multitenaculate and form branching colonies.

dendrostyle (den-drô-stil), n. [NL., < Gr. dêvropov, tree, + stylon, pillar: see style.] The axial style or stalk of the hydroid stage of the rhizostomous discophorous hydrosoma.

denel, n. See denel, denel.

denel (dên), n. [Also denel; a var. of din: see din.] Din. [Prov. Eng.]

denel, denel, n. See denel.

denegate (den'ê-gât), v. t. [< L. denegatus, pp. of denegare, deny: see deny.] To deny.

denel-hole (dên'hôl), n. [< denel = denel (or denel) + hole.] One of the many ancient artificial excavations or pits found in the Chalk formation of the south of England.

The general conclusion seems to be that these denel-holes were probably used for the secret storage of grain in British or Romano-British times. The Academy, Jan. 24, 1888.

Denelager, n. An obsolete form of Denelaw.

denelaw, n. [OF., the sixth of a bushel.] In Guernsey, formerly, a measure equal to one sixth of a bushel.

The action was to enforce payment of an annual Chief rents (in Guernsey) of 4 gr. d. d. of denelaw, one-half and three-sixteenths of a fifth of a denelaw of wheat, etc. N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 244.

dengue (deng'gâ), n. [A W. Ind. use of Sp. dengue, prudery, fastidiousness, lit. a refusing (= It. deniego, refusal, denial), < Sp. denegar = It. denegare, refuse, deny, < L. denegare, deny: see denegate, deny.] "This disease, when it first appeared in the British West India islands, was called the dandy-fever from the stiffness and constraint which it gave to the limbs and body. The Spaniards of the neighboring islands mistook the term for their word dengue, denoting prudery, which might also well express stiffness, and hence the term dengue became, at last, the name of the disease" (Tully, in Webster's Dict.).] A febrile epidemic disease, occurring especially in the West Indies and the southern United States, characterized by severe pain, particularly in the joints, and an eruption somewhat resembling that of measles. The attack is violent but brief, and is seldom fatal. Also called dandy, dandy-fever, breakbone fever. deniable (dê-ni'â-bl), a. [< deny + -able.] Capable of being denied or contradicted.

The negative authority is also deniable by reason. Sir T. Browne.

denial (dê-ni'âl), n. [< deny + -al.] 1. The act of denying or contradicting; the assertion of the contrary of some proposition or affirmation; negation; contradiction.

A denial of the possibility of miracles is a denial of the possibility of God. H. N. Oakesham, Short Studies, p. 285.

2. Refusal to grant; the negation or refusal of a request or a petition; non-compliance.

Here comes your father; never make denial, I must and will have Katharine to my wife. Shak., T. of the S., II. 1.

Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string. Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse. Milton, Lycidas, l. 12.

3. Refusal to accept or acknowledge; a disowning; rejection; as, a denial of God; a denial of the faith or the truth.

We may deny God in all those acts that are capable of being morally good or evil; those are the proper scenes, in which we act our confessions or denials of him. South.

4. In law, a traverse in the pleading of one party of the statement set up by the other; a defense. Rapaye and Lawrence.—Syn. 2. Disavowal, disclaimer.

denier (dê-ni'êr), n. [< deny + -er.] 1. One who denies or contradicts.

It may be I am esteemed by my denier sufficient of myself to discharge my duty to God as a priest, though not to men as a prince. Eaton Basilike.

2. One who refuses or rejects.—3. One who disowns; one who refuses to own, avow, or acknowledge.

Paul speaketh sometimes of deniers of God, not only with their lips and tongue, but also with their deed and life. J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1855), II. 223.

denier (de-nâr'), n. [Early mod. E. also denier, deniere; < OF. denier, F. denier, a denier, denarius, money, = Sp. Pg. It. denario, < L. denarius; see denarius.] A silver coin (also called the denarius introduced by the Carolingian dynasty into France, and soon issued, with varying types and legends, by other countries. It weighed about 22 grains, and was practically the sole silver coin of western Europe till the middle of the twelfth century. In England the corresponding silver coin was called a penny. The name denier d'Aquitaine was given by Edward III. of England to a silver coin (see cut above) struck for his French dominions.

denier (de-nâr'), n. [Early mod. E. also denier, deniere; < OF. denier, F. denier, a denier, denarius, money, = Sp. Pg. It. denario, < L. denarius; see denarius.] A silver coin (also called the denarius introduced by the Carolingian dynasty into France, and soon issued, with varying types and legends, by other countries. It weighed about 22 grains, and was practically the sole silver coin of western Europe till the middle of the twelfth century. In England the corresponding silver coin was called a penny. The name denier d'Aquitaine was given by Edward III. of England to a silver coin (see cut above) struck for his French dominions.

Witty Faith, 'tis somewhat too dear yet, gentlemen. Sir Ascham. There's not a denier to be hated, sir. Bacon, and Fl., Wit at several Weapons, v. 2.

denigrate (den'i-grât), v. t.; pret. and pp. denigrated, ppr. denigrating. [< L. denigrare, pp. of denigrare (> F. dénigrer = Sp. denigrar (cf. Fr. dénigrer = It. denigrare), blacken, < de + nigrare, make black, < niger, black: see negro.] To blacken; make black.

By suffering some impression from fire, bodies are casually or artificially denigrated in their natural complexion. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 12.

haired tail, and the first and fifth digits much shorter than the others. D. typus or maculatus is about 3½ inches long, the tail 4½ inches, of a grayish color, with a black stripe on the back, arboreal in habit, and found in South Africa.

Dendromorpha (den-drô-mô'r-fâ), n. pl. [NL., < Dendromorphus + -idae.] A family of nudibranchiate opisthobranchiate gastropods. They have dorsal gills, a small frontal veil, the tentacles laminated and retractile within sheaths, the vent lateral, jaws distinct, and the lingual ribbon broad and with many rows of teeth.

Dendromotus (den-drô-mô'tus), n. [NL., < Gr.

dêvropov, a tree, + môtos, back.] The typical genus of the family Dendromotidae.

Dendrophidius (den-drof'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Dendrophis + -idae.] A family of harmless colubrid or aglyptodont arboreal serpents; the Indian and African tree-snakes. They have a very thin or slender elongate form, the head flat and distinct from the neck, the ventral scales usually doubly carinate, and the subventral scales in two rows. They are very agile, live in trees, and feed chiefly on small reptiles, as lizards. In color they vary with their surroundings. There are two genera, Dendrophidius and Chrysophis. By most authors both genera are referred to the family Colembriidae and quite widely separated.

Dendrophis (den-drô'fis), n. [NL., < Gr. dêvropov, a tree, + phis, a serpent.] The typical genus of tree-snakes of the family Dendrophididae. The East Indian D. pictus and D. caudimaculatus are examples. See cut in next column.

Dendrophryniscidae (den-drô-fri-nis'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Dendrophryniscus + -idae.] A family of toads, typified by the genus Dendrophryniscus. They have no maxillary teeth, and have subcylindrical nasal discharges. The family contains a few Neotropical toad-like species. Also called Batrachophryniscidae.

denigration (den-i-grā'shŏn), n. [= OF. denigratio = Sp. denigración = Pg. denigração = It. denigratio, < L.L. denigratio (n.), < L. denigrare, blacken: see denigrate.] The act of making or becoming black, literally or figuratively; a blackening. [Archais.]

In three several instances of denigration the metals are worn off, or otherwise reduced into very minute parts.

Boyle, Works, I. 714.

I do not care to occupy myself with the denigration of a man (Dante) who, on the whole, deserves to be spoken of with respect.

Hussey, Lay Sermons, p. 151.

denigrator (den-i-grā-tŏr), n. [L. as if **denigrator*, < denigrare, blacken: see denigrate.] One who or that which blackens.

denigrature (den-i-grā-tŭr), n. [Cf. denigrate + -ure.] A making black. Bailey, 1727. See denigration.

denim (den'im), n. [A trade-name; origin unknown.] A colored twilled cotton material used largely for overalls.

denitrator (dē-nī-trāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. denitrated, ppr. denitrating. [Cf. de- priv. + nitr (is) + -ator.] To free from nitric acid.

denitration (dē-nī-trā'shŏn), n. [Cf. denitrator + -ion.] A freeing from nitric acid.

denitrification (dē-nī-trī-fī-kā'shŏn), n. [As denitrify + -ation. See denitrify.] The removal or destruction of nitrates.

denitrificator (dē-nī-trī-fī-kā-tŏr), n. [As denitrify + -ator. See denitrification.] An apparatus used in sulphuric-acid factories to impregnate the sulphurous acid obtained from burning sulphur or pyrites with nitrous fumes. It consists of a tower in which strong oil of vitriol charged with nitrous fumes from the Gay-Lussac tower and weak chamber-acid (sulphuric acid as drawn from the leaden chambers of the factory) are allowed to flow down over pieces of flint or coke against the current of hot sulphurous gases. The strong acid on dilution gives up its nitrous fumes, which are swept on with the other gases into the acid-chambers. Also called Glover's tower or denitrating tower.

denitrify (dē-nī-trī-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. denitrified, ppr. denitrifying. [Cf. de- priv. + nitr (is).] To remove or destroy nitrates.

Nitrogen that may be present in a nitrified form, or in a form easily nitrified, may escape assimilation by being set free by the denitrifying ferment described by Gayton and Dupetit and Springer.

Science, IX. 111.

denization (den-i-zā'shŏn), n. [Cf. AF. denization; as denize + -ation.] The act of making one a denizen, subject, or citizen.

A vast number of charters of denization were granted to particular persons of Irish descent from the reign of Henry II. downwards.

Hallem.

At Venice he had himself gained the rights of citizenship in 1476, only after the residence of fifteen years, which was required of aliens before denization.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 10.

deniset (de-nis'), v. t. [Formerly also denisise; < denise (n.), simulating verbs in -ise.] To make a denizen, subject, or citizen of; naturalize.

There was a private act made for denizing the children of Richard Hill.

Stypps, Edw. IV., 1552.

denizen (den-i-zŏn), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also denisen, denison, denison; < ME. deneyn, deneson, deneyson, deneynen, < AF. deneynen, deneynen, deneynen, deneynen, < OF. deneynen, OF. deneynen, deneynen, a denizen—that is, one within (ML. intra muros), as opposed to foreign, one without (ML. forinsecus) the privileges of the city franchise; < OF. deniz, deniz, deniz, F. deniz, within, < L. de intus, from within: de, from; intus, within, < in = E. in.] I. t. a. Within the city franchise; having acquired certain rights or privileges of citizenship.

Provided also, that yf any citizen deneyn or foreyn departe out of the said cite, and resorte agayn wryn a yere, that then he have benefice of alle libertes and priuylages of the said cite.

English Glde (E. E. T. S.), p. 303.

II. n. 1. A stranger admitted to residence and certain rights in a foreign country; in Eng. law, an alien admitted to citizenship by the sovereign's letters patent, but ineligible to any public office. The word has a similar meaning in South Carolina.

Also that no serlaunts no serlaunt go for har offeryng vn Cristemas day, no godre no fess of any denizen nor freyn at other seasons, but as he or they wolle agree by their tre wylle.

English Glde (E. E. T. S.), p. 304.

Heretupon all Frenchmen in England, not denizens, were taken Prisoners, and all their Goods sold for the King.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 303.

In the early Roman republic . . . the alien or denizen could have no share in any institution supposed to be coeval with the State.

Meine, Ancient Law, p. 42.

2. A citizen; a dweller; an inhabitant.

He summons straight his denizens of air.

Pope, R. of the L., li. 55.

The scene . . . is the spiritual world, of which we are as truly denizens now as heretofore.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 42.

denisen (den-i-zŏn), v. t. [Early mod. E. also denisen, denison; < denisen, n.; cf. denise.] To make a denizen; admit to residence with certain rights and privileges; denizenize.

Out of doubt, some new denizens'd lord.

Chapman, Busy d'Ambois, I. 1.

We have a word now denizenized, and brought into familiar use amongst us, compliment. Donna, Bermosa, xvi.

The Honors, Williamsons, and Nicolsons were among the first glass painters of the time: all natives of Holland, or born, as is said, "in the Emperor's Dominions," but denizenized in England.

N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 482.

denizenship (den-i-zŏn-ship), n. [Cf. denisen + -ship.] The state of being a denizen.

denik (dengk), a. Same as dénik. [Scotch.]

Denmark sátn. See sátn.

denmet (den'et), n. [Prob., like many other names of vehicles, from a proper name (Denmet?).] A light, open, two-wheeled carriage for traveling, resembling a gig.

In those days men drove "gigs" as they since have driven stanhopes, tilburies, denmets, and cabriolets.

F. Hook, Gilbert Gurney, II. xi. (Latham.)

denominable (dē-nŏm-i-nā-bl), a. [Cf. L. as if **denominabilis*, < denominare, name: see denominate.] Capable of being denominated or named.

An inflammation either simple, consisting only of an hot and sanguineous affluxion, or else denominable from other humours.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., li. 3.

denominator (dē-nŏm-i-nānt), n. [Cf. L. denominator (t.), ppr. of denominare, name: see denominate.] The abstract noun corresponding to an adjective that signifies an accidental quality, as bravery. Also denominator. See denominate.

denominate (dē-nŏm-i-nāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. denominated, ppr. denominating. [Cf. L. denominatus, pp. of denominare (> F. denommer = Pr. denommar = Sp. denominar = Pg. denomear = It. denominare), name, < de + nominare, name: see nominate.] To name; give a name or epithet to; call.

This is the residence of the pasha of Tripoli, from which city the whole pashalic is denominated.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 101.

The stuff which is denominated everlasting, and used as pantaloons by careful parents for their children.

Sydney Smith, To Mrs. Holland, ix.

Adversity . . . has been wisely denominated the ordeal of true greatness.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 423.

The minister was sometimes denominated the priest.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 218.

=Syn. To call, style, entitle, designate, dub.

denominate (dē-nŏm-i-nāt), a. [Cf. L. denominatus, pp.: see the verb.] In arith., denoting a number, and used with the name of the kind of unit treated of; qualifying: opposed to abstract. Thus, in the expression seven pounds, seven is a denominate number, while seven, without reference to concrete units, is an abstract number.

denomination (dē-nŏm-i-nā'shŏn), n. [= F. denomination = Pr. denominatio = Sp. denominación = Pg. denominación = It. denominazione, < L. denominatio (n.), a naming, metonymy, < denominare, name: see denominate.] 1. The act of naming: as, Linneus's denomination of plants.

The witty denomination of his chief carousing cups. One he calls his bull, another his bear, another his horse.

R. Jonson, Epicoene, II. 4.

2. A name or appellation; especially, a collective designation.

Is there any token, denomination, or monument of the Gaules yet remaining in Ireland, as there is of the Boylians?

Spencer, State of Ireland.

From hence that tax had the denomination of ship-money.

Clarendon, Civil War, I. 68.

All these came under the denomination of Anabaptists.

Stypps, Alp. Parker.

3. A class, society, or collection of individuals called by the same name; specifically, a religious sect: as, the Methodist denomination.—Internal denomination: external denomination, respectively, an attribute denoting something which is in the subject, and something which is not in it, but belongs to it in consequence of a relation to another thing; that which is intrinsic, and that which is extrinsic.

A subject receives adjuncts internal into itself: as snow, whiteness; the soul, science or knowledge; external to itself: as the night, color; soldiers, arms, etc. Internal give to the subject internal denomination; external, external: for when snow is denominated from whiteness, it is an internal denomination; but when a soldier is said to be armed, or the eye to see anything, it is an external denomination. Vulgarly these denominations are called intrinsic and extrinsic.

Burgesstolius, tr. by a Gentleman.

denominational (dē-nŏm-i-nā'shŏn-əl), a. [Cf. denomination + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of a name or appellation.—2. Pertaining to a denomination or sect.

Their seal was chiefly shown in the defence of their denominational differences.

Buechle, Civilization, I. 22.

denominationalism (dē-nŏm-i-nā'shŏn-əl-izm), n. [Cf. denominational + -ism.] The tendency to divide into sects or denominations; specifically, the inclination to emphasize the distinguishing tenets of a religious denomination, in contradistinction to the general principles adhered to by the whole class; a denominational or sectarian spirit.

The struggle going on between Secularism and Denominationalism in teaching.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 62.

"Politics" and "theology"—denominationalism, in whatever form, educational or any other—are the only subjects against which the College shuts its doors.

Nineteenth Century, XX. 246.

denominationalist (dē-nŏm-i-nā'shŏn-əl-ist), n. [Cf. denominational + -ist.] A member or an adherent of a denomination; one who favors denominationalism or sectarianism.

To some of the thorough-going denominationalists this seemed a good joke.

The Century, XXV. 152.

denominationalize (dē-nŏm-i-nā'shŏn-əl-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. denominationalized, ppr. denominationalizing. [Cf. denominational + -ize.] To render denominational in character and aims: as, to denominationalize education. [Rare.]

The religious sentiment somewhat but not too much denominationalized—to coin a new word.

The Nation, March 11, 1900, p. 190.

denominationaly (dē-nŏm-i-nā'shŏn-əl-i), adv. In a denominational manner; by denomination or sect.

denominative (dē-nŏm-i-nā-tiv), a. and n. [= F. denominatif = Pr. denominatiu = Sp. Pg. It. denominativo, < L.L. denominativus, pertaining to derivation, < L. denominare, name: see denominate.] 1. a. 1. Capable of receiving a denomination or name; namable.

The least denominative part of time is a minute.

Cocher, Arithmetic.

2. Constituting a distinct appellation; appellative; naming.

Connotative names have hence been also called denominative, because the subject which they denominate is denominated by, or receives a name from, the attribute which they connote.

J. S. Mill, Logic, I. iii. § 6.

3. In gram., formed from a noun- or adjective-stem: applied especially to verbs so made.

II. n. 1. That which has the character of a denomination, or term that denominates or describes.—2. Specifically, in gram., a word, especially a verb, formed from a noun, either substantive or adjective.

Peter is said to be valiant; here valiantness is the denominator, valiant the denominative, and Peter the denominated; for Peter is the subject whereunto the denominator doth cleave.

Blunderbille.

denominatively (dē-nŏm-i-nā-tiv-i), adv. By denomination.

denominator (dē-nŏm-i-nā-tŏr), n. [= F. denominator = Sp. Pg. denominador = It. denominatore, < NL. denominator, < L. denominare, name: see denominate.] 1. One who or that which gives a name; one from whom or that from which a name is derived.

Eber, . . . the Father of the Hebrews, and denominator of the Hebrew tongue.

Lightfoot, Harmony of Old Testament, p. 27.

Specifically.—2. In math.: (a) In arith., that term of a fraction which indicates the value of the fractional unit; that term of a fraction which represents the divisor, and is, in common fractions, written below the dividend or numerator. See fraction. Thus, in  $\frac{3}{5}$  is the denominator, showing that the integer is divided into five parts, 3 of which parts are taken. (b) In alg., a divisor placed under a dividend, as in a numerical fraction.—3. Same as denominant.

denotable (dē-nŏ-tā-bl), a. [Cf. denote + -able.] That may be denoted or marked.

In hot regions, and more spread and digested flowers, a sweet savor may be allowed, denotable from several human expressions.

Sir T. Browne, Miscellanies, p. 24.

denotative (dē-nŏ-tāt'), v. t. [Cf. L. denotatus, pp. of denotare, denote: see denote.] To denote; signify.

Those terms of all and for ever in Scripture are not eternal, but only denotate a longer time, which by many examples they prove.

Burton, Anal. of Mel., p. 714.

Wherefore serve names, but to denotate the nature of things?

Sp. Hall, Against Romanists, § 24.

denotation (dē-nŏ-tā'shŏn), n. [= F. denotation = Sp. denotación = Pg. denotación = It. denotazione, < L.L. denotatio (n.), a marking or pointing out, < L. denotare, mark out, denote: see denote.] 1. The act of denoting or indicating by a name or other sign; the attaching of a designation to an object; that function of a name or other designation by which it calls up to the mind addressed the idea of an object for which it may stand.

A term used as a term of denotation is used "without prejudice," as English lawyers sometimes say, to the real meaning or true connotation of the term, which is left to be settled afterwards. Hedges, Mind, IX. 52.

2. That which a word denotes, names, or marks, in distinction from that which it means or signifies. See connotation.

We may either analyze its (a general term's) connotation or muster its denotation, as the context or the cast of our minds may determine.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 77.

When a name has fallen into this state, [it] can only be made serviceable by stripping it of some part of its multifarious denotation. J. S. Mill, Logic, I. III. § 7.

denotative (dē-nō'tā-tiv), a. [= Sp. lt. denotativo; as denotate + -ive.] Having power to denote.

What are the effects of sickness? The alteration it produces is no denotative, that a person is known to be sick by those who never saw him in health.

denotatively (dē-nō'tā-tiv-ly), adv. In a denotative manner; by way of denotation.

The classes, whether plural or individual, are all alike represented denotatively by literal symbols. W. v. F. F. von, Symbolic Logic, p. 25.

I use the word given denotatively, to designate what I mean, abstracting from that part of its connotation which involves a giver and receiver. Hedges, Mind, IX. 52.

denote (dē-nōt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. denoted, ppr. denoting. [OF. denoter, F. denoter = Sp. Pg. denotar = lt. denotare, < L. denotare, mark out, denote, < de- + notare, mark, < nota, a mark: see note. Cf. connote.] 1. To mark off from others; identify by a mark; designate; name; signify by a sign, especially a visible sign: as, the character X denotes multiplication. See connote.

'Tis not alone my linky cloak, good mother, . . . That can denote me truly. Shak., Hamlet, I. 2.

The serpent with the tail in its mouth denotes the eternity of God, that he is without beginning and without end. Brace, Source of the Nile, I. 415.

On several imperial coins we meet with the figure of a funeral pile, without anything to denote the burning of it, though indeed there is on some of them a flambeau sticking out on each side, to let us know it was to be consumed to ashes. Addison, Ancient Medals, II.

The word man denotes Peter, James, John, and an indefinite number of other individuals, of whom, taken as a class, it is the name. J. S. Mill, Logic, I. II. § 5.

2. To be the sign or symptom of; show; indicate: as, a quick pulse denotes fever.

Thy wild acts denote
The unreasonable fury of a beast. Shak., E. and J., III. 2.

=Syn. 1. Note, Denote, Connote. See the definitions of these words.—2. To betoken, imply.

dénouement (dā-nō'mōn), n. [F., also dénouement, < dénouer, untie, < de- + priv. + nouer, tie, knot, < L. nodare, tie, knot, < nodus = E. knot: see node and knot.] The solution of a mystery; the winding up or catastrophe of a plot, as of a novel, drama, etc.; the issue, as of any course of conduct; the event.

The end, the climax, the culmination, the surprise, the discovery, are all slightly different in meaning from that ingenious loosening of the knot of intrigue which the word dénouement implies. Saturday Rev., No. 1474.

I grieve not to be able to point my tale with the expected moral, though perhaps the true dénouement may lead to one as valuable.

Mary, Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 215.

denounce (dē-nōns'), v. t.; pret. and pp. denounced, ppr. denouncing. [ME. denouncen, < OF. denoncier, denoncier, F. denoncier = Sp. Pg. denunciar = lt. denunciare, < L. denunciare, denuntiare (pp. denuntiare, whence the other E. form denunciate), declare, announce, threaten, denounce, < de- + nunciare, nuntiare, announce, < nunciare, more correctly nuntiare, a messenger: see nuncio. Cf. announce, pronounce, pronounce, renounce.] 1. To make known in a formal manner; proclaim; announce; declare.

And thus the Angel denounced to Zacharie the Nativity of Saint John the Baptist. Forster, Marie of Eng. Travels, p. 71.

I denounce and declare, by the authority of God's word and doctrine of Christ, that ye be truly baptized within. Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parsons Soc., 1860), p. 71.

2. To proclaim or declare as impending or threatened; formally or publicly threaten to do or effect; make a menace of: as, to denounce war; to denounce punishment.

I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish. Deut. XXX. 12.

The great Master of the Prussians sent an Herald to denounce war to the King. Habington's Voyages, I. 145.

To the wicked, God hath denounced ill success in all that they take in hand. Milton, Illegionates, xviii.

They impose their wild conjectures for laws upon others, and denounce war against all that receive them not. Deasy of Christian Piety.

The laws of the United States have denounced heavy penalties against the traffic in slaves.

D. Webster, in Lodge, p. 275.

3. To proclaim censure or condemnation of; brand publicly; stigmatize; arraign: as, to denounce one as a swindler, or as a coward.

To denounce the immoralities of Julius Cæsar. Brougham, Fox. (Latham.)

No man is denounced for acting or thinking in the sixteenth century what the sixteenth century acted and thought. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 25.

In terrible earnest he denounced the public crime, and meted out to every official, high and low, his due portion. Emerson, Theodore Parker, p. 272.

I . . . think they [the Puritans] were right in denouncing the Court of High Commission and all its works.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 325.

4. To make formal or public accusation against; inform against; accuse: used especially where knowledge of wrongful acts has been acquired confidentially or stealthily: as, to denounce a confederate in crime; to denounce one to the authorities.

He soon found that it was necessary for him openly to denounce the Jacobins to the Legislative Assembly and the nation, as the enemies of the country.

Sheratt, Orations, I. 497.

5. In Mexican and Spanish mining-law: (a) To lay an information against (a mine) as forfeit because of abandonment, or through being insufficiently worked; hence, to claim the right to work (such a mine) by laying an information against it. (b) To announce and register the discovery of (a new mine or mineral deposit), and thus preempt; hence, to lay claim to on the ground of discovery and registry.—6. In diplomacy, to announce the intention of abrogating (a treaty) in accordance with its provisions or arbitrarily.

denouncement (dē-nōns'ment), n. [OF. denouncement, denouncement, < denoncier, denounce: see denounce and -ment.] 1. The act of denouncing; the declaration of a menace, or of evil; denunciation. [Rare.]

False is the reply of Cain upon the denouncement of his curse, My iniquity is greater than I can bear. Sir T. Browne.

He receiv'd his due denouncement from God.

Milton, Civil Power.

2. In Mexican and Spanish mining-law, application to the authorities for the grant of the right to work a mine, either on the ground of new discovery, or on the ground of forfeiture of the rights of a former owner, through abandonment or contravention of the mining-law. See denounce, 5.

The title to these deposits is a denouncement as discoverer of four pertenencias—twenty-four Mexican feet in length, with an appropriate width, depending on the inclination of the vein. Mexico, Arizona and Sonora, p. 112.

denouncer (dē-nōn'ser), n. 1. One who denounces; one who threatens or menaces.

Here comes the sad denouncer of my fate. Dryden.

2. One who endeavors to obtain possession of or right to a mine or other land by denouncement.

de novo (dē nō'vō). [L. de, of; novo, abl. of novus = E. new.] Anew; from the beginning.

dens (dens), n.; pl. denes (den'tēs). [L. den (t) = E. tooth.] 1. In anat. and dentistry, a tooth.

—2. In anat. and soot., a tooth-like or dentate part or organ. See tooth.—Dens incisivus, a incisive tooth; a premolar.—Dens caninus, a canine tooth.—Dens molaris, an molar tooth.—Dens molaris, a molar tooth, a grinder, whether molar proper or premolar. (b) The incus or anvil, one of the little bones of the ear, so called from its shape in man.—Dens sagittalis, a wisdom-tooth; a last molar.—Dens sceleratus, a scelerous tooth. Owen.

dense (dens), a. and n. [= F. dense = Sp. Pg. lt. densus, < L. densus, thick, close, set close, dense (opposed to rarus, thin, rare), = Gr. δαίς, thick, dense, shaggy, hairy, rough: see Daïs.] 1. a. 1. Having great or unusual consistency of elements or closeness of parts; closely compacted or conglomerated; compact; close; thick: as, a dense body; a dense cloud or fog; a dense panicle of flowers.

The cause of cold is the density of the body, for all dense bodies are colder than most other bodies.

Boveri, Nat. Hist.

This surrounding chaos . . . was far from being solid: he resembles it to a dense though fluid atmosphere. Goldsmith, Animated Nature, I. 25.

The boundless ether back to roll,
And to replace the cloudy barrier denes.

Croquer, Iliad, v.

The decks were dense with stately forms
Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

3. In soot., closely set; separated by very small intervals: as, dense punctures, hairs, etc.—4. In photog., more or less opaque; strong in the contrast of lights and shades: said of a negative exhibiting these characteristics, and capable of giving a brilliant print, or even, if it be too dense, a harsh one, as distinguished from a weak or thin negative, the picture on which presents small contrasts, while its film is inclined to be more or less transparent, even in the lights, and the resulting print is flat. Also expressed by strong and intense.

With good dense negatives the printing may be conducted in direct sunshine. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 257.

4. Figuratively, without break or interruption; difficult to penetrate; solid and heavy: as, dense ignorance; dense wit; dense stupidity.—5. Thick-headed; obtuse; stolid; stupid; dull.

I must needs conclude the present generation of playgoers more virtuous than myself, or more dense. Lamb, Artificial Comedy.

=Syn. 1. Condensed, compressed.

IL† n. A thickset.

The hog-ward who drove swine to the dense in the woodland paid his lord fifteen pign at the slaughter-time, and was himself paid by the increase of the herd.

J. S. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 280.

densely (dens'li), adv. In a dense manner; compactly.

densen (den'an), v. t. [denase + -en.] To make dense or more dense. [Rare.]

In 1900 there is some densening of population within the old lines and a western movement along the Mohawk in New York State.

denseness (dens'nes), n. The state of being dense; condition as to density.

deneshire, denasher (den'āshēr), v. t.; pret. and pp. deneshured, deneshered, ppr. deneshuring, deneshoring. [First quoted as denasher; so called from Deneshire, contr. of Devonshire.] To improve (land) by burning parings of earth, turf, and stubble, which have been cast in heaps upon it, and then spreading the ashes over the ground as a compost.

deneshiring, deneshoring (den'āshēr-ing), n. The act or process of improving land, as defined under deneshire. Also called burn-beating (which see).

Burning of land, or burn-bating, is commonly called deneshiring, that is Devonshire or Denbighshire, because most used, or first invented there.

Northing, Husbandry.

Mr. Bishop of Merton first brought into the south of Wiltshire the improvement by burn-baking, Deneshiring, about 1620.

densimeter (den-sim'e-tēr), n. [= Sp. densímetro, < L. densus, dense, + metrum, a measure.] An apparatus for ascertaining the specific gravity or comparative density of a solid or liquid, as metals, gunpowder, or sea-water. That used for testing the density of gunpowder consists essentially of a vessel in which the gunpowder is weighed in connection with mercury. The vessel is first partially filled with mercury by creating a vacuum; it is then emptied and a known weight of powder is placed in it, and the mercury again added under the influence of the same vacuum, less being admitted, however, in consequence of the space occupied by the powder. A comparison of the amount of mercury admitted with the weight of the powder gives the specific gravity of the powder. The optical densimeter of Hilgard consists of a glass prism for holding salt water, and a collimating telescope for examining a ray of light passing through the water in the prism, the refraction of the light giving the density of the water by comparison with the known angle of refraction of distilled water or sea-water of a known density. Hilgard's densimeter is used for ascertaining the density of syrups while boiling. See asthenometer.

density (den'si-ti), n. [= F. densité = Sp. densidad = Pg. densidade = lt. densitas, < L. densitas (t), thickness, < densus, thick: see dense.] 1. The quality of being dense, close, or compact; closeness of constituent parts; compactness, actual or relative.

The density of the ether is greater in liquids and solids than in gases, and greater in gases than in vacuum.

2. The mass or amount of matter per unit of bulk. The mass is the ratio of the living force or double the energy of motion to the square of the velocity. Experiments made by Newton upon the effect of attaching masses of different materials to pendulums have shown that the weights of bodies are precisely proportionate to their masses; consequently, the density is measured by the specific gravity, or the weight of a unit bulk. The unit of density is generally taken as that of water at its temperature of maximum density (4° C., 39° F.) and under ordinary pressure. Inasmuch as the gram was intended to be, and within the limits of the probable error of the best observations actually is, the mass of one cubic centimeter of water under these conditions, it follows that the density as ordinarily expressed is, as closely as possible, the number of grams in one cubic centimeter of the particular kind of matter in question. The following table shows the density of several important substances: iridium, 22.4; platinum, 21.4; gold, 19.3; liquid mercury, 13.6; lead, 11.3; silver, 10.5; copper, 8.9; nickel, 8.7; iron, 7.8; tin, 7.3; zinc, 7.2; the earth, 5.6; solution of iodides of mercury and potassium, 3.3; diamond, 3.5; rock, about 2.7; aluminium, 2.6; sulphur, 2.0; magnesium, 1.7; the human body, 1.1; India-rubber, 1.0; alcohol, 0.8; ether, 0.7; lithium, 0.6; vapor of iodide of arsenic, 1.02; air, 0.0013; aqueous vapor, 0.0008; hydrogen, 0.00009. See specific gravity, under gravity.

The quantity of matter per unit of space is defined as the density of the mass filling that space.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 194.

The density of a body is measured by the number of units of mass in a unit of volume of the substance.

Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 82.

3. In elect., the quantity of electricity per unit of volume at a point in space, or the quantity of electricity per unit of area at a point on a surface.

The electric volume-density at a given point in space is the limiting ratio of the quantity of electricity within a sphere whose centre is the given point to the volume of the sphere, when its radius is diminished without limit. . . . The electric density at a given point on a surface is the limiting ratio of the quantity of electricity within a sphere whose centre is the given point to the area of the surface contained within the sphere, when its radius is diminished without limit.

Clerk Maxwell, Elect. and Mag., § 64.

Gravimetric density of gunpowder, the weight of a measured quantity of gunpowder. It is expressed by the weight, in ounces, of a cubic foot of the powder. — Magnetic density, the rate of distribution of lines of force in a magnetic field. The unit is the gauss or one c. g. s. line per square centimeter.

dent<sup>1</sup> (dent), n. and a. [ME. dent, a var. of dent; see dent, dent. In the sense of 'notch' the word belongs rather to dent<sup>2</sup>, the two words being partly confused.] I. n. 1. A stroke; a blow.

Whence he com the chayne too,
With hys ax he smot it in two; . . .
It was a noble dent.

Richard Coeur de Lion, l. 3613.

2. Force; weight; dint.

No man with yuel wille, Ensample, or tynge, or strokys dent.
Hymns to Virgins, etc. (E. T. S.), p. 104.

3. A hollow mark made by a blow or by pressure; a small hollow or depression on the surface of a solid or a plastic body; an indented impression; a dint.

The bullet, shot at the distance of 20 yards, made a very considerable dent in a door. Hist. Royal Society, l. 307.

II. a. Marked by a dent or impression; dented; only in the phrase dent corn, Indian corn which has a depression in each kernel. [U. S.]

The few trials made with dent (or soft) corns lead me to think their aluminoids have a higher digestion coefficient than the flints. E. F. Ladd, Amer. Chem. Jour., VIII, 494.

dent<sup>2</sup> (dent), v. [*ME. *dention*, var. of dinten, dunten, knock, strike, dint; see dent, v., and dent<sup>1</sup>, n. Cf. indent<sup>1</sup>.] I. trans. To make a dent or small hollow in; mark with dents or impressions.

English, Scotch, and Latin Poems, p. 61.

I dente, Jennifer — It was an horrible stroke; so howe it hath dented in his harness. Palgrave.

The street of the tomb, with its deeply dented chariots.
J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 177.

II. t. intrans. To aim a denting or effective blow.

My heart, although dented at with ye arrows of thy burning affections, . . . shall always keepe his hardness. Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 373.

dent<sup>3</sup> (dent), n. [F. dent, OF. dent = Sp. diente = Pg. dente, L. den(t)-s = Goth. denthus = AB. tith, E. tooth; see tooth, and cf. dental, dentist, etc. This word in E. is in part confused with dent<sup>1</sup>, n.] 1. A notch; an indentation.

High was his comb, and coral-red withal,
In dents embattled like a castle-wall.

Dryden, Cock and Fox.

2. A tooth of a comb, metallic brush, or card. — 3. A salient tooth or knob in the works of a lock. E. H. Knight. — 4. A tooth of a gear-wheel. E. H. Knight. — 5. A cane or wire of the reed frame in a weavers' loom.

dent<sup>4</sup> (dent), v. t. [ML. dento, by aphoresis for indent, OF. endenter, ML. indentare, tooth, notch, indent; see indent<sup>2</sup> and dent<sup>2</sup>, n. This word is in part confused with dent<sup>1</sup>, v.] To notch; indent.

Dentyn or yndentyn, [L. indento.

Prompt. Parv., p. 112.

The sylvan dair of the dente daytly was dent.

Gower and Golegar, l. 6.

dentagra (den-tag'ra), n. [L. den(t)-s, = E. tooth, + Gr. agra, a hunting, catching, taken in the senses it has in rodagra, a trap for the feet, also gout in the feet (> E. podagra), zeugagra, gout in the hands (> E. chiragra).] 1. The tooth-sack. — 2. An instrument for drawing teeth; a tooth-forceps.

dental (den'tal), a. and n. [= F. dental = Sp. Pg. dental = It. dentale, NL. dentale, pertaining to the teeth (L. only in neut., dentale, n., the share-beam of a plow), L. den(t)-s = E. tooth; see dent<sup>2</sup> and tooth.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the teeth. — 2. In gram., formed or pronounced at or near the front upper teeth, with the tip or front of the tongue: as, d, t, and n are dental letters. The name dental is very imperfectly descriptive, as the teeth bear no important part in producing the sounds in question, and even, in the utterance of many communities, no part at all. Hence some phonetists avoid the term, using instead lingual, tongue-point, or the like.

The Hebrews have assigned which letters are labial, which dental, and which guttural. Baron.

3. Connected with or used in dentistry: as, dental rubber; a dental mallet or hammer. — Dental arch, the curved line of the teeth in their sockets, corresponding to the alveolar border of each jaw. The somewhat parabolic curve of this arch in man, and its continuity, are among the diagnostic sociological characters of the genus Homo. — Dental canal. See canal. — Dental cartilage. See cartilage. — Dental cavity, the natural hollow of a tooth; the pulp-cavity (which see). — Dental chisel, cut, drill, file, foramen, etc. See the nouns. — Dental formula, a formal or tabular statement of the number and kinds of teeth a mammal may have; a formula of the dentition, in which the letters i, c, pm, and m, respectively denote incisor, canine, premolar, and molar, and figures are used to indicate the number of each kind of teeth, the figures above a horizontal line (like the numerator of a fraction) referring to the upper jaw, those below the line to the lower jaw. When the letter d is prefixed to i, c, pm, and m, it signifies deciduous, and consequently the formula is that of the milk-dentition. The dental formula is usually written in full, as in the subjoined extract; but since there are always the same number of teeth on each side of either jaw, sometimes only each half jaw is indicated; thus, the formula for adult man would be: i 2, c 1, pm 2, m 2 x 2 = 32. See the extract.

The dental formula of a child over two years of age is thus:

$$i \frac{2}{2-2}, c \frac{1}{1-1}, pm \frac{2}{2-2}, m \frac{2}{2-2} = 20;$$

which means that the child should have two incisors, one canine, and two molars, on each side of each jaw. . . . The formula of the permanent dentition in man is written:

$$i \frac{2-2}{2-2}, c \frac{1-1}{1-1}, pm \frac{2-2}{2-2}, m \frac{2-2}{2-2} = 32;$$

there being two incisors, one canine, two premolars, and three molars on each side above and below.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 80.

Dental hammer. See hammer. — Dental letter. See II. 1. — Dental mallet. See mallet. — Dental pulp. (a) The soft, sensitive, nervous and vascular substance which fills the cavity of a mature tooth. (b) The tissue or structure out of which a tooth is formed, and from which, as in the case of rudents, it may continue to grow for an indefinite period, in which case the teeth are said to have perpetual pulp. — Dental sac, a closed dental follicle. See the extract.

The teeth are moulded upon papillae of the mucous membrane, which may be exposed, but are more usually sunk in a fold or pit, the roof of which may close in so as to form a dental sac. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 80.

II. n. 1. A sound formed by placing the end of the tongue against or near the upper teeth, as d, t, and n (see I., 2). — 2. In conch., a tooth-shell; a shell of the family Dentaliidae.

Two small black and shining pieces seem, by the shape, to have been formed in the shell of a dental. Woodward.

dentalid (den-tal'i-id), n. A solenocoonch of the family Dentaliidae.

Dentalium (den-tal'i-ds), n. pl. [NL., < Dentalium + -ida.] A family of mollusks, constituting the class Scaphopoda (or order Cirribranchiata of Gastropoda); the tooth-shells. They are diocious, headless, eyeless, with a trilobate foot, rudimentary larval jaws, the mouth surrounded with filiform tentacles; the shell slender, conical, curved, open at both ends, with circular aperture and posterior abscissment of the animal; the mantle sacculus open at both ends, the foot being protruded through the larger opening. The larvae are free-swimming and ciliate, with a somewhat bivalvular shell, which subsequently becomes tubular. There are about 50 living and upward of 100 extinct species, the latter mostly Devonian. The animals live buried in the mud, where they crawl slowly about. (See Scaphopoda, tooth-shell.) The family has been divided by recent systematists into various genera, for which the names Dentalium, Antalis, and Ensis have been used. Also Dentalia, Dentalidae.

dentality (den-tal'i-ti), n. [< dental + -ity.] The state or quality of being dental, as a consonant.

Dentalium (den-tal'i-um), n. [< NL. dentalis, < L. den(t)-s = E. tooth; see dental.] The typical and leading genus of the family Dentaliidae. Different limits have been assigned to it. By the older conchologists it was used for all the Dentaliidae, or forms with tooth-like shells; but more recently it has been restricted to Dentaliidae with the posterior end of the tooth-like shell furnished with an internal slightly projecting tube provided with a dorsoventrally elongated opening.

dentalization (den-tal'i-zā-shun), n. [< dental + -ize + -ation.] Conversion to a dental, as to d or t: said of articulate sounds.

The latter [Sanskrit k or c], usually designated by k<sup>2</sup> (or q), is frequently liable to labialization (or dentalization) in Greek. Encyc. Brit., XXI, 270.

Dentaria (den-tā'ri-ā), n. [NL., fem. of LL. dentarius, pertaining to the teeth; see dentary.] A genus of cruciferous plants, natives of the cooler portion of the north temperate zone. It is nearly allied to Cardamine, with which it is united by some authorities, differing mainly in its few opposite or subverticillate outline leaves, and in its acaly creeping or tuberous rootstock. From its toothed pungent roots it derives the names of coral-root, toothwort, pepper-root, etc. The flowers are large, white or light-purple.

dentary (den'ta-ri), a. and n. [LL. dentarius, pertaining to the teeth, < L. den(t)-s = E. tooth; see dent<sup>2</sup>, dental.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the teeth; dental. — 2. Bearing teeth: as, the dentary bone. See II.

Each ramus of the lower jaw is composed of an articular and a dentary piece. Owen, Anat., IV.

Dentary apparatus, in echinoderms, the oral skeleton. See lantern of Aristotle, under lantern.

II. n.; pl. dentaries (-ris). The distal or symphyseal piece or element of the compound lower jaw of vertebrates below mammals: so called because it bears or may bear teeth. It commonly forms most of the lower jaw as visible from the outside. In birds without teeth it forms about that part of the under mandible which is sheathed in horn. The dentary, as a rule, effects symphysis or unites with its fellow of the opposite side at its distal end; at its proximal end it is articulated or ankylosed with other bones, forming the proximal part of each half of the lower jaw. See cuts under Oplodius, Gallina, and temporo-mandib.

dentata (den-tā'tā), n. [NL., fem. (sc. vertebra) of dentatus, toothed; see dentate.] The odontoid vertebra or axis; the second cervical vertebra: so called from the odontoid or tooth-like process which forms a pivot about which the atlas turns. See cut under axis.

dentate (den'tāt), a. [= F. denté = Pr. dentat = Sp. Pg. dentado = It. dentato, toothed (= E. toothed), < L. dentatus, < den(t)-s = E. tooth.] Toothed; notched. Specifically—(a)

In bot., in a general sense, having a toothed margin; more especially, having acute teeth which project outward; as, a dentate leaf; or having tooth-like projections: as, a dentate root. (b) In zool. and anat., having tooth-like processes or arrangements of parts, especially in series along an edge, margin, or border, like the teeth of a saw; serrate; denticulate. Also dentated. — Dentate antennae, those antennae in which each joint has an angular projection on one side, near the apex. — Dentate body, the corpus dentatum (which see, under corpus). — Dentate mandible, a mandible provided with blunt or sharp projections on the inner side. — Dentate margin, properly, a margin having a series of sharp projections, the sides of which are equal, with the apex opposite the middle of the base; but the term is often applied to any toothed margin, whether the projections are sharp or blunt. — Dentate maxilla, maxille which are armed at the apex with sharp teeth. — Dentate wings, wings with dentate margins.

dentate-ciliate (den'tāt-sil'i-ti), a. [< dentate + ciliate.] In bot., having the margin dentate and fringed or tipped with cilia or hairs.

dentated (den'tā-ted), a. Same as dentate.

dentately (den'tāt-i), adv. In a dentate manner.

dentate-serrate (den'tāt-ser'it), a. In entom., both serrate and toothed; applied to a serrate margin when each projection or denticulation is toothed along its edge.

dentate-sinuate (den'tāt-sin'ū-it), a. In entom., having angular teeth with incurved spaces between them.

dentation (den-tā'shun), n. [< dentate + -ion.] 1. Dentate character or condition. [Rare.]

Now, in particular, did it get its barb — its dentation! Paley, Nat. Theol., xiii.

2. In entom., an angular projection of a margin: used especially in describing the wings of Lepidoptera.

Dentate Leaf.

of the "Dentaria"

dentate<sup>2</sup> (den'ted), p. a. [< den(t) + -ate.] Having teeth or notches; notched.

dentelle (den'tel'), n. [F., lace, edging, < ML. dentellus, dim. of L. den(t)-s = E. tooth: see dentil.] 1. Lace.—2. In bookbinding, a style of angular decoration, which in its simplest form is like a row of saw-teeth, and in an ornate form is like the points of point-lace.

dentelure (den'te-lür), n. [< F. dentelure, dentelation, indentation, < denteler, indent, notch, *< *dentel*, a tooth: see dentil.] In soci., same as dentition. [Rare.]

Dentex (den'teks), n. [NL. < L. dentex, a sort of sea-fish, < den(t)-s = E. tooth.] The typical genus of Denticinae.

Denticinus (den-ti-sin'), n. pl. [NL. < Dentex (-tio) + -inus.] A subfamily of sparoid fishes, typified by the genus Dentex, with all the teeth conic, some of the anterior ones caniniform, and the cheeks scaly. Also Denticini.

denticine (den-ti-sin'), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Denticinae.

2. n. One of the Denticinae.

denticle (den-ti-kl'), n. [< L. denticulus, dim. of den(t)-s = E. tooth. Cf. denticule, dentil.] 1. A small tooth or projecting point; a denticulation; specifically, one of the long slender elements of the morphologically compound teeth of the Cape ant-eater, Orycteropus capensis, the only example of such structure among mammals.

The tooth is really made up of a number of very elongated and slender denticles ankylosed together into one solid mass. Miscell., Klem. Anat., p. 276.

2. Any small toothed or tooth-like part: as, the shagreen denticles of the shark.

Thin almsy in clefts the denticle of capriole or all the kalkulur. Chaucer, Astrolabe, l. 23.

Dermal denticle, an enameled dental tegumentary structure, as a placoid scale of a selachian.

As they agree with teeth in structure, they may be spoken of as dermal denticles. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 424.

Denticrura (den-ti-krü-rä), n. pl. [NL. < L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + crura (crur-), leg.] In Latroille's system of classification, the third section of brachelytrous pentamerous (Oleopora), represented by such genera as Oryctolites, (Leontius, etc.

denticulate, denticulated (den-tik'ü-lät, -lä-ted), a. [< L. denticulatus, furnished with small teeth, < denticulus, a small tooth: see denticule, denticule. Cf. denticulated.] 1. Finely dentate; edged with minute tooth-like projections: as, a denticulate leaf, calyx, etc.

Fringed with small denticulate processes. Owen, Anat.

2. In arab., formed into denticles.

denticulation (den-tik'ü-lä'shon), n. [< denticulate + -ion.] 1. A denticulated condition or character.

He omits the denticulation of the edges of the bill, or those small oblique incisions made for the better retention of the prey. N. Grew, Museum.

2. A denticle, or projection on a denticulate margin; a small tooth, or set of small teeth or notches: frequently used in the plural.

denticule (den-ti-kül'), n. [< F. denticule, a denticule, < L. denticulus: see denticule and dentil.] 1. A dentil.—2. In her., one of a number of small squares ranged in a row, or following the outline of the shield in a sort of border. They are supposed to represent the denticles of the architectural entablature.

denticulus (den-tik'ü-lus), n.; pl. denticuli (-ii). [L.: see denticule.] 1. Same as denticule.—2. In arab., a dentil.

dentiform (den-ti-för-m), a. [= F. dentiforme = Pg. dentiforme, < L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + forma, shape.] Having the form of a tooth; tooth-like; odontoid; specifically, in entom., projecting and pointed, the section approaching an equilateral triangle, as a process.

dentifrice (den'ti-fris), n. [< F. dentifrice = Pg. It. dentifricio, < L. dentifricium, a tooth-powder, < den(t)-s, = E. tooth, + fricare, rub: see friction.] A powder or other substance used in cleaning the teeth. The term is now also applied to liquid preparations for the same purpose.

The shells of all sorts of shell-fish, being burnt, obtain a caustic nature; most of them, as ordered and powdered, make excellent dentifrices. N. Grew, Museum.

dentigerous (den-tij'ü-rus), a. [= F. dentigère, < L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + gerere, carry.] Bearing or supporting teeth; supplied with teeth.

The cranial structure of the Muraenidae, in which the intermaxillaries are absent, and the nasal bone dentigerous. Owen, Anat.

dentil, dental (den'til, -tel), n. [*< OF. *dentel*, **dentel* (cf. OF. dentel, var. of dental, dentail, < L. dentale, part of a plowshare) = Fr. dentel, dentilh = It. dentello, < ML. dentellus, dentillus, equiv. to L. denticulus, a little tooth, a modillion, dim. of den(t)-s = E. tooth: see dentil, dental, and cf. dentelle, denticle, denticule.] 1.

Ionian Dentils (d)—Caryatid porch of the Erechtheum, Athens.

In arch., one of a series of little cubes into which the square member in the bed-molding of an Ionic, a Corinthian, a Composite, or occasionally a Roman Doric cornice is cut.

These [Corinthian] pillars stand on pedestals, which are very particular, as the lower member of the cornice is worked in dentils. Pocock, Description of the East, II. ii. 208.

Columns and round arches . . . support square windows which are relieved from ugliness by a slight moulding, the dentil, . . . which is seen everywhere. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 212.

2. In her., one of the teeth or indents in anything indented or dancetté: used alike of the projecting teeth and of the notches between them.

dentalial (den-ti-lä'bi-äl), a. and n. [< L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + labium, lip: see labial.] 1. a. Formed or articulated by means of the teeth and lips, as a sound.

A dentalial instead of a purely labial sound. Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 64.

2. n. A sound formed by the combined action of the teeth and lips, as English r.

denticulated, denticulated (den'til-ä-ted, -tel-ä-ted), a. [= Sp. denticulado = It. denticellato, *< ML. *denticellatus*, equiv. to L. denticulatus, furnished with small teeth, < denticulus, a little tooth: see dentil, denticule, and denticulate.] Having teeth or notches; marked with notches or indentations. Also written denticulated.

An observation made by Bonard at Toulon during the recent eclipse, "of a very fine red band, irregularly denticulated, or, as it were, crumpled here and there." A. M. Clerke, Astron. in 19th Cent., p. 90.

The Syrians restricted ornament to denticulated leaves of a conventional form deeply marked and sharply cut out. C. C. Perini, Italian Sculpture, Int., p. 221.

dentile (den'til), n. [< ML. dentillus, a small tooth: see dentil.] In conch., a small tooth like that of a saw.

dentilingual (den-ti-ling'gwäl), a. and n. [< L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + lingua = E. tongue: see lingual. Cf. linguadental.] 1. a. Formed between the teeth and the tongue: said especially of the two t sounds of this and the, less properly of the sounds generally called dental (which see). Also called linguadental.

2. n. A consonant formed between the teeth and the tongue.

Real dentilinguals, produced between the tongue and teeth. Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 65.

Less properly dentilingual.

dentiloquist (den-til'ö-kwist), n. [< dentiloquy + -ist.] One who practises dentiloquy; one who speaks through the teeth.

dentiloquy (den-til'ö-kwi'), n. [< L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + loqui, speak: see loquation.] The act or practice of speaking through the teeth, or with the teeth closed.

dentin, dentine (den'tin), n. [= F. dentine (= It. dentina), < L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + -ina, -ine.] The proper substance or tissue of teeth, as ivory, for instance, as distinguished from enamel, cement, or pulp. Dentin resembles bone, but is ordinarily denser and harder. The difference is seen on microscopic section, when a multitude of very fine close-set tubules or canaliculi (the dental tubes) are seen following a parallel straight or wavy course, and no corpuscles or lacunae appear, while bone-tissue shows abundant corpuscles with the canaliculi radiating in every direction. The corpusculated parts of teeth are the softer constituents, as the cement or pulp, for example, whence the canaliculi alone penetrate the dentin, which is therefore comparable to the canalicular substance of bone in a state of extreme density and hardness. See cut under tooth.

dental (den'ti-näl), a. [< dentin + -al.] Of or pertaining to dentin. Dental tubes, the minute tubes of the dentin or ivory tissue of the tooth. See dentin.

dentine, n. See dentin.

dentophone (den'ti-fön), n. [< L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + Gr. φωνή, voice, sound.] An instrument for conveying sonorous vibrations to the inner ear by means of the teeth. See audiophone.

dentiroster (den-ti-ros'tér), n. A bird of the tribe Dentirostres.

dentirostral (den-ti-ros'tral), a. [< NL. dentirostrum, toothed-billed (< L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + rostrum, a beak, + -al.] Having the character assigned to the Cuvierian Dentirostres. The notch, nick, or tooth of the bill of the Dentirostres is not to be confounded with the tooth of the bill of certain birds of prey, as falcons, nor with the series of teeth of the lamellirostral birds, as ducks. In very many technically dentirostral birds there is no trace whatever of a notch or tooth.

Dentirostral Bill (Shrike).

dentirostrate (den-ti-ros'trät'), a. [< L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + rostratus, beaked, < rostrum, a beak: see rostrum.] Same as dentirostral.

Dentirostres (den-ti-ros'trés), n. pl. [NL., pl. of dentirostrum, toothed-billed: see dentirostral.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, the first family of his Passerinae, "wherein the upper mandible is notched on each side towards the point. It is in this family that the greatest number of insectivorous birds occur, though many of them feed likewise upon berries and other soft fruits." They are contrasted with Caprimulgidae, Coraciidae, and Troglodytidae. The immense assemblage of birds here indicated is definable by no common character, least of all by the one assigned by Cuvier, and the term consequently fell into disuse. It is still employed, however, in a modified sense, for a superfamily group of oscine passerine birds approximately equivalent to the turdoid Passeres of Wallace. See Passeres, Turdiformes.

2. In Sundevall's system of classification, a phalanx of the cohort (Cichlomorphae: synonymous with Laniiformes, as the name of a superfamily group embracing the shrikes and their immediate relatives.—3. In Selater's arrangement of 1880, a group of laminipalmar oscine Passeres, practically equivalent to the Cichlomorphae of Sundevall.

denticalep (den'ti-akalp), n. [< L. den(t)-s = E. tooth, + scalpere, scrape.] An instrument for scraping or cleaning the teeth.

dentist (den'tist), n. [= F. dentiste = Sp. Pg. It. dentista, *< NL. *dentista*, < L. den(t)-s = E. tooth.] One whose profession it is to clean and extract teeth, repair them when diseased, and replace them when necessary by artificial ones; one who practises dental surgery and mechanical dentistry; a dental surgeon.

denticial, denticial (den-tis'tik, -ti-käl), a. [< dentist + -ic, -ical.] Relating to dentistry or dentists.

Even the crocodile likes to have his teeth clean; insects get into them, and, horrible reptile though he be, he opens his jaws inefficiently to a faithful denticial bird, who volunteers his beak for a toothpick. Beloeil, My Novel, iv. 1. (Darwin.)

dentistry (den'tis-tri), n. [< dentist + -ry.] The art or profession of a dentist; dental surgery.

Notwithstanding the merit possessed by a few of the German works upon the teeth, practical dentistry has not attained as high a degree of perfection in the German states and provinces as it has in some other countries. Harris, Dict. of Dental Science.

dentition (den-tish'on), n. [= F. dentition = Sp. denticion = Pg. dentitio = It. denticione, < L. dentitio (n-), teething, < dentire, cut teeth, < den(t)-s = E. tooth: see dentil, dental.] 1. The process of cutting teeth; teething.—2. The time during which teeth are being cut.—3. The kind, number, and arrangement of the teeth proper to any animal: as, the caniniform dentition, in which the teeth are normally specialized as incisors, canines, premolars, and molars; the rodent dentition, in which some or all of the teeth grow indefinitely from persistent pulps, the incisors are scaliform, and canines are absent; the monophodont dentition, in which there is but one set of teeth; the diphodont dentition, in which there are two sets of teeth, etc. Many dentitions are known technically by the name of the genus or other group of animals to which they pertain, as the protopodont dentition, the polyprotodont dentition, the bunodont, batimodont, etc., the adjective in such cases being frequently applied to the animals themselves as well as to the number and arrangement of their teeth. See cuts under corrodent and ruminant. For formulas of dentition, see dental formula, and dental a.

Greatly as the dentition of the highest ape differs from that of man, it differs far more widely from that of the lower and lowest apes. Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 101.

4. The state of being toothed or dentate; dentification.—Milk dentition, deciduous dentition, the set of teeth which are shed and replaced by another set, as in man and other diphyodont animals.

dentice (den'tis), v. t.; pret. and pp. denticed, pp. dentising. [With suffix -ice, < L. dentire, get or cut teeth: see dentition.] To cut one's teeth; teethe. Nares.

They tell a tale of the old Countess of Desmond, who lived till she was seven-score years old, that she did denice twice, or thrice: casting her old teeth, and others coming in their place. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 755.

dentoid (den'toid), a. [< L. den(-t)-s, = E. tooth, + Gr. eidos, form: see -oid.] Resembling a tooth; shaped like a tooth; tooth-like.

dentolingual (den-tō-ling'gwāl), a. and n. See dentilingual.

den-tree (den'trē), n. An Australian name for the Eucalyptus polyanthema.

denture (den'tūr), n. [< F. denture, a set of teeth, < dent (< L. den(-t)-s = E. tooth) + -ure.] The provision of teeth in the jaws; specifically, in dentistry, a set of artificial teeth, a whole set being called a full denture.

denity (den'ti), a. A Scotch form of dainty.

denuded (dē-nū'dē-ted), a. [< de-priv. + nudus + -ate + -ed: see nudate.] Characterized by the disappearance of nuclei.

denudate (den'ū- or dē-nū'dāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. denudated, pp. denudating. [< L. denudatus, pp. of denudare, make bare, strip: see denude.] To strip; denude. Hammond.

Till he has denuded himself of all incumbrances, he is unqualified. Denay of Christian Piety.

denude, denudated (den'ū- or dē-nū'dāt, -dā-ted), a. [< L. denudatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. In bot., deprived of covering, as of foliage or pubescence; naked; glabrate.—2. In zool., destitute of scales, hair, or other covering; nude: specifically, in entom., said of the wings of Lepidoptera when they are clear in parts, appearing as if the scales had been rubbed off.—3. In geol., denuded. See denudation.

denudation (den'ū-dā'shun), n. [From F. dénudation = Sp. denudacion = Pg. denunciação = It. denudazione, < L.L. denudatio(n)-, < L. denudare, denude: see denude.] 1. The act of stripping off covering; a making bare.

There must be a denudation of the mind from all those images of our phantasy, how pleasing soever, that may carry our thoughts aside from those better objects. Ep. Hall, Devout Soul, § 10.

2. In geol., the wearing away and removal by natural agencies, such as rain, rivers, frost, ice, and wind, of a part of the solid matter of the earth's surface. The matter thus carried away is said to have been eroded, and the terms erosion and denudation are alike as indicating the result of the work of erosive or denuding agencies.

Prof. Geikie has calculated that, at the present rate of denudation, it would require about 5½ million years to reduce the British Isles to a flat plane at the level of the sea. Huxley, Physiography, p. 148.

denude (dē-nū'd'), v. t.; pret. and pp. denuded, pp. denuding. [From OF. denuer, F. dénuer, also denuder = Sp. denudar, denudar = Pg. denudar = It. denudare, < L. denudare, make bare, strip, < de, off, + nudare, make bare, < nudus, bare: see nude.] 1. To strip or divest of all covering; make bare or naked.

The eye, with the skin of the eyelid, is denuded, to show the muscle. Sharp, Surgery.

If in summer-time you denude a vine-branch of its leaves, the grapes will never come to maturity. Nay, Works of Creation.

Specifically.—2. In geol., to wear away and remove surface or overlying matter, and thus make bare and expose to view (the underlying strata).

Where the rain comes down in a deluge, as often happens in the tropics, its power as a denuding agent is almost incredible. Huxley, Physiography, p. 121.

—Byn. To bare, lay bare, uncover.

denuded (dē-nū'ded), p. a. Stripped; divested of covering; laid bare.—Denuded rocks, in geol., rocks exposed by the action of denudation. See denudation.

denumerant (dē-nū'mē-rant), n. [< L. de- + numerare(-t)-s, pp. of numerare, number, numerate: see numerate.] The number of solutions of a determinate system of equations.

The denumerant may be algebraical or arithmetical. In estimating the former, all solutions count, whether or not deducible from one another by interchange between the unknowns. In estimating the latter, solutions which become identical by permuting the unknowns are regarded as one and the same solution. J. J. Sylvester, 1888.

denumeration (dē-nū'mē-rā'shon), n. [< L. as if "denumerare" (> OF. denommer), count over, enumerate, < de, down, + numerare, count: see numerate, number.] In law, present payment; payment down or on the spot.

denuncia (Sp. pron. dē-nūn'thi-ā), n. [Sp., < denunciar, denounce: see denounce.] In Mexico and Spanish America: (a) The judicial proceedings by which a person claims and secures the right to a mine which he has discovered, or one the title to which has been lost or forfeited by the neglect of the owner to work it or by his having violated the mining-ordinances. (b) A similar judicial proceeding by which waste or abandoned lands may be preempted.

denunciable (dē-nūn'gi-ā-bl), a. [From Sp. denunciable, < N.L. as if "denunciabilis", < L. denunciare, denounce: see denounce.] Subject to denouncement; fit or proper to be denounced. See denouncement.

denunciant (dē-nūn'gi-ant), a. [< L. denunciant(-t)-s, denuntiant(-t)-s, pp. of denunciare, denuntiare, denounce: see denunciate.] Ready or prone to denounce; denunciative.

Of all which things a poor Legislative Assembly and Patriot France is informed by denunciant Friend, by triumphant Foe. Carlyle, French Rev., II. v. 8.

denunciate (dē-nūn'gi-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. denunciated, pp. denunciating. [< L. denunciat(-t)-s, denuntiat(-t)-s, pp. of denunciare, more correctly denuntiare, declare, denounce: see denounce.] Same as denounce.

The vicinage of Europe had not only a right, but an indispensable duty and an exigent interest, to denunciate this new work before it had produced the danger we have so severely felt. Burke, A Begicla Peace, I.

denunciation (dē-nūn'gi-ā'shun), n. [From F. dénonciation = Pr. denunciaçāo = Sp. denunciaçion = Pg. denunciação = It. denunciaçione, < L. denunciat(-t)-s, denuntiat(-t)-s, < denunciare, denuntiare, pp. denunciatus, denuntiat(-t)-s, denounce: see denounce.] 1. The act of denouncing or announcing; announcement; publication; proclamation; annunciation: as, a faithful denunciation of the gospel.

She is fast my wife,
Have that we do the denunciation lack
Of outward order. Shak., M. for M., I. 3.

This publicly and reiterated denunciation of banns before matrimony is an institution required and kept both by the churches of the Roman correspondence and by all the Reformed. Ep. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

2. Solemn or formal declaration accompanied with a menace; a declaration of intended evil; proclamation of a threat; a public menace: as, a denunciation of war or of wrath.

When they rejected and despised all his prophecies and denunciations of future judgments, then follows the sentence. Donne, Sermons, vi.

Christ tells the Jews that, if they believe not, they shall die in their sins; did they never read those denunciations? Ep. Ward.

Uttering bold denunciations of ecclesiastical error. Notley.

3. In Scots law, the act by which a person who has disobeyed the charge given on letters of horning is outlawed or proclaimed a rebel.—4. In civil law, accusation against one of a crime before a public prosecuting officer.—5. The act of denouncing a treaty.

denunciative (dē-nūn'gi-ā-tiv), a. [From F. dénonciatif = Pg. denunciaçivo, < L.L. denuntiativus, < L. denuntiare: see denunciate.] Partaking of the character of a denunciation; denunciatory; prone to denunciation; ready to denounce.

The clamorous, the idle, and the ignorantly denunciative. Ferraz, Language, iv.

denunciator (dē-nūn'gi-ā-tōr), n. [From F. dénonciateur = Pr. Sp. Pg. denunciador = It. denunciatore, < L.L. denuntiator, < L. denuntiare: see denounce, denunciate.] 1. One who denounces; one who publishes or proclaims, especially intended evil; one who threatens.—2. In civil law, one who lays an information against another.

The denunciator does not make himself a party in judgment, as the accuser does. Aspley, Paragon.

denunciatory (dē-nūn'gi-ā-tōr-i), a. [From Sp. Pg. denunciatorio, < L.L. as if "denunciatorius", < denuntiator, a denouncer: see denunciator.] Relating to or implying denunciation; containing a public threat; comminatory.

denutrition (dē-nū'tri-ā'shun), n. [< de-priv. + nutrition.] Want or defect of nutrition: the opposite of nutrition. Thomas, Med. Diet.

deny (dē-nī'), v.; pret. and pp. denied, pp. denying. [< M.E. denyen, rarely denoyen, also denayen (see denay), < OF. denier, denoer, denoier, denoier, F. dénier = Pr. denegar, deneyar, denegar, denegar = Sp. Pg. denegar = It. denegare, deny, < L. denegare, deny, < de- + negare, deny, say no: see negation.] L. trans. 1. To say "no" or "nay" to; gainsay; contradict.

I put it all vpon yow, and kepe ye myn honoure as ye owe to do. And what ye ordeyne I shall it not deny. Martin (R. E. T. S.), I. 88.

His own way he will still have, and no one dare deny him. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, p. 137.

2. To declare to be untrue or untenable; reject as false or erroneous; refuse to admit, accept, or believe: as, to deny an accusation, or the truth of a statement or a theory; to deny a doctrine.

When the knewen all the cause, the kynges bydene,
All denys it anon; no mon assentid.
Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), I. 8009.

Reason, joining or disjoining, frames
All what we affirm or what deny. Milton, P. L., v. 107.

But she loved Enoch; tho' she knew it not,
And would if ask'd deny it. Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

No one, except under constraint of some extravagant theory, denies that pleasure is good.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 308.

3. To refuse; refuse to grant or give; withhold or withhold from: as, to deny bread to the hungry; to deny a request.

To stande in fatte lande wol it not denye.
Palladius, Hushondrie (R. E. T. S.), p. 115.

He [St. Augustine] cannot mean simply that audiences should altogether be denied unto men, but rather that if men speak one thing and God himself teaches another, then he, not they, to be obeyed.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, II. 7.

Think not ill manners in me for denying
Your offer'd meat; for, sure, I cannot eat
While I do think she wants. Beau. and FL., Coxcomb, iv. 2.

'Twill be hard for us to deny a Woman any thing, since we are so newly come on Shore.
Wycherley, Plain Dealer, I. 1.

4. To reject as non-existent or unreal; refuse to believe in the existence of; disallow the reality of. [Rare.]

Many deny witches at all, or if there be any they can do no harm. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 128.

Though they deny two persons in the Trinity, they hold, as we do, there is but one God.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I. 20.

5. To refuse access to; keep from being seen; withhold from view or intercourse: as, he denied himself to visitors.

The butler . . . ushered me very civilly into the parlour, and told me though my lady had given strict orders to be denied, he was sure I might be admitted.

Steele, Tatler, No. 262.

6. To refuse to acknowledge; disavow; renounce; disown.

And if he do he shall be compelled incontinently to denye his faith and crystendome, or ellys he shalbe put to execution of deth by and by.

Sir R. Gwyforde, Pilgrimage, p. 44.

He that denieth me before men shall be denied before the angels of God. Luke xii. 9.

Here's a villain, that would face me down . . .
That I did deny my wife and house. Shak., C. of M., III. 1.

7. To forbid.

I am denied to sue my livery here,

deodand (dē-ō-dand), n. [Cf. ML. deodandum, i. e., Deo dandum, a thing to be given to God: Deo, dat. of Deus, God (see deity); dandum, neut. of dare, to be given, ger. of dare, give (see date).] Formerly, in Eng. law, from the earliest times, a personal chattel which had been the immediate occasion of the death of a rational creature, and for that reason given to God—that is, forfeited to the king to be applied to pious uses and distributed in alms by his high almoner. Thus, if a cart ran over a man and killed him, the cart was by law forfeited as a deodand, and the coroner's jury was required to fix the value of the forfeited property. The pious object of the forfeiture was early lost sight of, and the king might and often did order his right to deodands within certain limits as a private perquisite. Deodands were not abolished till 1846.

For love should, like a deodand,
Still fall to th' owner of the land.

S. Butler, The Lady's Answer to the Knight, l. 103.

deodar (dē-ō-dār'), n. [Cf. NL. deodara, < Skrt. devadāru, divine tree, < dēva, divine, a god (see dava), + dāru, wood, a species of pine, related to dru, a tree, and to E. frer.] In India, a name given to different trees, principally of the natural order Coniferae, when growing at some place held sacred by the Hindus. The tree more commonly known by this name, and often mentioned by the Indian poets, is the Cedrus deodara, nearly related to the cedar of Lebanon, a large tree widely distributed in the Himalayas from Nepal to Afghanistan. The wood is very extensively used on account of its extreme durability. At Simla in India the name is given to the Cupressus torulosa.

We set out for a walk through a magnificent forest of deodar, yew, fir, and oak.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 166.

deodate (dē-ō-dāt), n. [Cf. L. Deo datus, given to (or by) God: Deo, dat. of Deus, God; datus, pp. of dare, give: see deodand and date.] 1. A gift or offering to God; a thing offered in the name of God.

Long it were to reckon up particularly what God was owner of under the Law: . . . of this sort [was] whatsoever their Orban contained, wherein that blessed widow's deodate was laid up.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 22.

2. A gift from God. Davies.

He observed that the Dr. was born of New-Year's Day, and that it was then presaged he would be a deodate, a fit new-year's gift for God to bestow on the world.

Sir H. Wotton, Beliquim, p. 61.

Department of Agriculture, an executive department of the United States government, the duties of which are to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among them new and valuable seeds and plants. Its chief is the Secretary of Agriculture, and under his direction are an assistant secretary and other officials, including a statistician, an entomologist, a botanist, and a chemist.—
Department of Justice, in the United States, a department under the direction of the Attorney-General, who is required to give his advice and opinion on questions of law whenever requested by the President or by the head of any executive department. He exercises general superintendence and direction over the district attorneys and marshals of all the districts in the United States and Territories, and appears in person or by regular or special assistants in all cases where the United States is a party. In this department are also a solicitor-general and six assistant attorneys-general.—Department of Labor, an executive department of the United States government, under the charge of the Commissioner of Labor. See Com- missioner.—Department of State, an executive division of the United States government, presided over by the Secretary of State, who ranks as first in importance among the cabinet officers. He is the authorized organ of communication for the government in all its relations with foreign powers. He conducts all negotiations, and directs the correspondence with all diplomatic and consular agents of the government accredited to other countries.
In this department are also an assistant secretary and a second and third assistant secretaries.—Department of the Interior, a division of the government of the United States, under charge of the Secretary of the Interior, which has jurisdiction of various branches of internal administration specifically assigned to it. Its principal divisions are the General Land Office, Patent Office, Pension Office, Bureau of Indian Affairs and of Education, the decennial Census Bureau when in existence, the national geological survey, government printing and publication, etc. Besides the heads of these divisions, there are in the department a commissioner of labor and a commissioner of railroads, and several officers in charge of minor matters.—Department of the Navy, an executive division of the United States government, at the head of which is the Secretary of the Navy, charged with the control and administration of affairs connected with the navy and navigation. Its principal functions are distributed among the Bureau of Navigation, Ordnance, Equipment and Recruiting, Yards and Docks, Medicine and Surgery, Provisions and Clothing, Steam Engineering, and Construction and Repair. Besides the matters indicated by the titles of these bureaus, the department has the control of the Naval Observatory at Washington, the Nautical Almanac, the Hydrographic Office, etc.—Department of the Treas- ury, the division of the United States government having charge of all matters concerning the public revenues and disbursements, besides a number of others not directly related to finance. Its chief is the Secretary of the Treasury, and the principal financial officers under him are three assistant secretaries, two controllers, six auditors, the United States treasurer, register of the Treasury, commissioner of internal revenue, see deputy commissioner, commissioner of customs, controller of the currency, deputy controller, and director of the mint. The department also has control of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, a Bureau of Statistics, the revenue marine, the coast survey, lighthouses (through the Lighthouse Board), the life-saving service, the inspection of steamboats, the erection of national buildings, etc.—Department of War, the executive military division of the United States government, under charge of the Secretary of War, having control of all affairs relating to the general management and administration of the army, under the supervision of the President as commander-in-chief. Its principal officers are the adjutant, inspector, quartermaster, paymaster, commissary, and surgeon-general, and judge-advocate-general, chief medical purveyor, and chief of engineers. The department formerly controlled the Signal Service Bureau (now under the Department of Agriculture). It has charge of the national buildings and grounds at Washington.—Medical department (medic.), a non-combatant staff corps of an army, which has charge of all field and general hospitals, and whose officers attend the sick and wounded, and are responsible for all hospital and medical stores.—Ordnance department, a corps of officers in the United States army concerned with the inspection and fabrication of ordnance and ordnance stores, the inspection and repair of arms, and the manufacture of military equipments of all kinds to be supplied to the regular army, the militia of the several States and Territories, and to the marine corps. Its officers determine all the details of gun construction for the War Department.—Post-office Department of the United States, a division of the government, presided over by the Postmaster-General, whose duty it is to conduct the postal service, to establish and discontinue post-offices, to grant mail contracts, to appoint many minor officials, and to superintend generally the business of the department, and execute all laws relating to the postal service. There are four assistant postmasters-general.

5. In navigation: (a) The distance in nautical miles made good by a ship due east or due west: in the former case it is called easting, and in the latter, westing. When the two places are on the same parallel, the departure is the same as the distance sailed. (b) The bearing or position of an object from which a vessel commences her dead-reckoning.—6. In law, the abandonment of one's former ground, in pleading or process, which is implied by interposing a pleading stating as the grounds of action or defense matter inconsistent with or substantially different from that originally indicated; the change involved or attempted after beginning an action or a defense on one ground, in endeavoring to continue it on one substantially different. Incongruity between successive causes of action or defenses in one and the same pleading, when disallowed, is termed misjoinder.—Angle of departure. See angle.—Departure of an imaginary quantity, its argument. See argument.—8. New departure, a change of purpose or method; a new course of procedure: as, this constitutes a new departure in the photographic art.

We candidly admit that in these remarkable works he takes a new departure. Athenaeum, No. 3067, p. 180.

To take a departure, to determine the place of a ship in starting on a voyage. This is done by referring to some other position of known latitude and longitude.—Syn. 2. Withdrawal, exit, retirement, removal.

depas (dē-pas'), n. [Gr. δέω.] In Gr. archaeol., a drinking-cup or bowl.

Depas amphipyllos, a twofold or double cup; a cup having two handles or ears, or one divided into two parts by a partition: sometimes interpreted as a vessel consisting of two bowls joined by their bottoms, so that either can serve as a foot for the other. It is generally agreed that the vessel so called by Homer was a simple two-handled cup of the same class as that shown in the illustration.

deposcent (dē-pas'ent), a. [L. deponere (> de + ponere), also deponent deposci, feed upon, consume, < de + pasci, feed: see pasture, pastor.] Feeding.

Sir J. Herschel.

I kept within a foot of my dependable little guide, who crept gently into the jungle
Sir S. W. Baker, Heart of Africa, p. 63.

dependableness (dē-pen'dā-bl-nes), n. The quality or state of being dependable; reliability.

The regularity and dependableness of a storage cistern may very well make it desirable to put up with some waste provided it be not excessive.
Engin. Mag., XXXI. 490.

dependance, dependancy (dē-pen'dans, -dāns), n. See dependence, dependency.

dependant (dē-pen'dant), a. and n. See dependent.

dependence (dē-pen'dens), n. [Formerly sometimes spelled dependance, after F. dependance; = Sp. Pg. dependencia = It. dependenza, dependenza, < ML. dependētia, < L. dependē(t)-e, ppr., dependent: see dependent.] 1. The fact of being dependent or pendent; the relation of a hanging thing to the support from which it hangs; a hanging; also, the hanging thing itself. [Rare.]

And made a long dependence from the bough. Dryden.

2. The relation of logical consequent to its antecedent, of conclusion to premise, or of a contingent fact to the condition upon which it depends; the relation of effect to cause. In this sense dependence is said to be in ferri, in esse, or in operari: in ferri, when the cause brings the effect into being; in esse, when the continued existence of the effect is due to the cause; in operari, when the effect cannot itself act as a cause without the cooperation of its cause. The word is also applied in this sense to the relation of accident to substance; also, to the accident itself, as being in this relation.

Causality and dependence. that is, the will of God, and his power of acting.
Clark, The Attributes, III.

3. The state of deriving existence, support, or direction from another; the state of being subject to the power and operation of some extraneous force; subjection or subordination to another or to something else: as, dependence is the natural condition of childhood; the dependence of life upon solar heat.

Having no relation to or dependence upon the court Clarendon, Civil War, III. 623.

All our dependence was on the Drafts, which only pointed out to us where such and such Places or Islands were, without giving us any account, what Harbour, Roads, or Bays there were.
Dampier, Voyages, I. 416.

It [the word colony] suggests the notion of a body of settlers from some country who still remain in a state of greater or less dependence on the mother-country.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 24.

4. Reliance; confidence; trust; a resting on something: as, we may have a firm dependence on the promises of God.

When once a true principle of piety and of a religious dependence on God is duly excited in it, it will operate beyond the particular cause from whence it springs.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. vii.

The great dependance is upon the Duke; the soldiers adore him, and with reason.
Walpole, Letters, II. 4.

5. In law: (a) The quality of being conditional on something else. See dependent. (b) Pendency; the condition of awaiting determination.

My father is to advance me a sum to meet, as I have alleged, engagements contracted during the dependence of the late negotiation.
Shelley, in Dowden, II. 8.

An action is said to be in dependence from the moment of citation till the final decision of the House of Lords.
Baill.

Moral dependence, the relation of the will to the moral law. = BYN. Dependence, Dependancy. See dependency.

dependency (dē-pen'den-si), n.; pl. dependencies (-sis). [Formerly also dependancy, an extension of dependence. See -ence, -ency.] 1. Same as dependence.

They must have their commission, or letters patent from the king, that so they may acknowledge their dependency upon the crown of England.
Bacon.

The country has risen from a state of colonial dependency.
D. Webster, Speech, Plymouth, Dec. 23, 1830.

2. That of which the existence presupposes the existence of something else; that which depends for its existence upon something else.

Of this frame the bearings and the ties,
The strong connections, none dependencies.
Pope, Essay on Man, l. 30.

3. An accident or a quality; something non-essential.

Modes I call such complex ideas . . . which are considered as dependencies, or affections of substances. Locke.

4. That which is subordinate to and dependent upon something else; especially, a territory subject to the control of a power of which it does not form an integral part; a dependent state or colony: as, the sun and its dependencies; the dependencies of Great Britain.

The rapidly rising importance of the Anglo-Indian and Australian Colonies and dependencies.

We have sometimes taken spirit of salt, and carefully dephlegm'd it.
Boyle.

dephlegmate (dē-fleg'māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. dephlegmated, ppr. dephlegmating. [< NL. dephlegmatus, pp. of dephlegmare, dephlegm, dehydrate: see dephlegm.] To deprive of superabundant water, as by evaporation or distillation; rectify: said of spirits or acids.

We dephlegmated some by more frequent . . . rectifications.
Boyle, Works, I. 222.

dephlegmation (dē-fleg-mā'sh-n), n. [= F. déflégment = Sp. defflemaçion = Pg. defflegmaçion = It. defflegmazione, < NL. **dephlegmatio(n)-e*, < dephlegmare, dephlegmate: see dephlegmate.] The operation of separating water from spirits and acids by evaporation or repeated distillation; concentration.

In divers cases it is not enough to separate the aqueous parts by dephlegmation.
Boyle.

dephlegmator (dē-fleg'mā-tŏr), n. A condensing apparatus for stills, consisting sometimes of broad sheets of tinned copper soldered together so as to leave narrow spaces between them, the liquid flowing successively from one space to the next, and sometimes of a worm or continuous pipe in large stills.

dephlogmedness (dē-flo-mēd-nēs), n. [< dephlogmed, pp. of dephlogm, + -ness.] The state of being freed from phlegm or watery matter.

The proportion betwixt the coralline solution and the spirit of wine depends . . . much upon the strength of the former liquor and the dephlogmedness of the latter.

Boyle, Works, I. 442.

dephlogisticated (dē-flo-jis-ti-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. dephlogisticated, pp. dephlogisticating. [< de-priv. + phlogisticate, q. v.] To deprive of phlogiston, once supposed to exist as the principle of inflammability. See phlogiston.—Dephlogisticated air. See air.

Are we not authorised to conclude that water is composed of dephlogisticated air and phlogiston deprived of part of their latent . . . heat?

J. West, Philoa. Transactions (1794), p. 382.

dephlogistication (dē-flo-jis-ti-kā-shn), n. A term applied by the older chemists to certain processes by which they imagined phlogiston, the supposed principle of inflammability, to be separated from bodies.

dephosphorization (dē-fos'for-i-zā-shn), n. [< dephosphorise + -ation.] The act or process of depriving of or freeing from phosphorus.

dephosphorise (dē-fos'for-is), v. t.; pret. and pp. dephosphorised, pp. dephosphorising. [< de-priv. + phosphorise.] To deprive of phosphorus; eliminate phosphorus from: as, to dephosphorise iron.

The problem of dephosphorising iron ores is one of great importance, as the most extensive deposits are nearly all contaminated with this impurity depict (dē-pikt'), v. t. [*< ME. *depicten (only as a pp., depict), < OF. depictor, depict, < L. depictus, pp. of depingere, paint, depict; see depictant.*] 1. To portray; paint; form a likeness of in colors: as, to depict a lion on a shield.

Fortune and Time fettered at their feet with adamant chains, their wings deplumed for starting from them

depolarization (dē-pō'lā-rī-zā'shōn), n. [= F. dépolariation = It. depolarizzazione; as depolarize + -ation.] The act of depriving of polarity or removing the effects of polarization. Specifically—(a) In optics, the change in the direction of the plane of polarization, as by a section of a crystal, so that the polarized ray before arrested (an pass through the analyzer. (b) In elect., the removal of the polarizing film of gas from the negative plate of a voltaic cell. (c) In magnetism, the destruction of magnetic polarity in a mass of iron or steel. See polarization. Also spelled depolarisation.

depolarize (dē-pō'lā-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. depolarized, ppr. depolarizing. [= F. dépolariiser = It. depolarizzare; as de-priv. + polarize.] To deprive of polarity; remove the effects of polarity from. (a) In optics, to cause to reappear, as a polarized ray before arrested by the analyzer. (b) To destroy that polarity in (metallic electrodes immersed in an electrolytic substance, or the metal plates of a battery) which results from the passage of a current, and opposes and weakens the current to which it is due. (c) To deprive of magnetic polarity. Also spelled depolarise.

depolarizer (dē-pō'lā-rī-zēr), n. That which depolarizes; specifically, in elect., a substance used in a battery-cell for the purpose of preventing polarization. Depolarizers usually act by entering into combination with the gases liberated, and thus preventing their accumulating on the battery-plates and giving rise to polarization. Also spelled depolariser.

depolish (dē-pō'līsh), v. t. [< de-priv. + polish, after F. dépolir = Pg. depolir, depolish.] To destroy the polish of; remove the glaze from; dull.

The surface should now appear somewhat depolished
Ure, Dict. II. 630.

depolishing (dē-pō'līsh-ing), n. The process of removing polish or glaze; specifically, in ceram., a process whereby the glaze on ware is removed. Ware with the resulting dull surface is called worv porcelain. It corresponds to the deglazing of glass.

depose (dē-pōn'), v.; pret. and pp. deposed, ppr. deposing. [= Sp. deponer = Pg. depor = It. deporre, diporre = D. deponeren = G. deponieren = Ian. deponere = Sw. deponera, < L. deponere, pp. deponitus, lay down or aside, give in charge, intrust, ML. also testify, < de, down, away, + ponere, lay, place: see ponent and posse, and cf. depose, deposit, etc.] I. trans. 1. To lay down; deposit.

What basins, most capacious of their kind,
Enclose her, while the obedient element Lifts or deposes its burthen.
Southey

2. To lay down as a pledge; wager.

On this I would depose
As much as any cause I've known.

3. To testify; state in a deposition.

Farther deposed that he entered himself thereafter in conference with Boui
State Trials, George Sprot, an. 1606.

II. intrans. In Scots and old Eng. law, to give testimony; bear witness; depose.

deponent (dē-pō'nēt), a. and n. [< L. deponens(-t)-, ppr. of deponere, lay aside (LL. deponens(-t)-, adj., also as a noun (acc. verbum), a verb that 'lays aside' its proper passive sense: tr. Gr. ἀποθετικός: see apothesis), ML. also testify: see deponere.] I. a. Laying down.—Deponent verb, in Latin gram., a verb which has a passive form with an active signification, as loqui, to speak: so called because such verbs were regarded as having laid down or dispensed with an active form and a passive sense.

II. n. 1. In Latin gram., a deponent verb.—2. One who deposes or makes a deposition, especially under oath; one who makes an affidavit; one who gives written testimony to be used as evidence in a court of justice, or for any other purpose. Abbreviated dpt.

He observed how the testimony of the other deponents confirmed that of Houseman
Butler, Eugene Aram, vi. 5.

depopulacy (dē-pop'ū-lā-sī), n. [< depopulate: see -acy.] Depopulation.

Mary answered: 'O Jove, neither she nor I,
With both our aids, can keep depopulacy
From off the frown.

Chapman, tr. of Homer's Batrachomyomachia

depopularize (dē-pop'ū-lā-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. depopularized, ppr. depopularizing. [= F. dépopulariser = Pg. depopularizar; as de-priv. + popularize.] To render unpopular. Westminster Rev. [Rare.]

depopulate (dē-pop'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. depopulated, ppr. depopulating. [< L. depopulatus, pp. of depopulari, ML. also depopulare (> It. depopulare = Sp. depopular, depoplar = Pg. depopular = Pr. depopular = OF. depopuler, depopuler, depopuler, also depewler, depewler, depewler, > E. depewle, dispeople), lay waste, ravage, plunder, ML. also deprive of people, dispeople, < de- + populari, lay waste, ravage, plunder, destroy, a word usually derived from populus, people, and explained as "prop. to spread or pour out in a multitude over a region," or "to fill with (hostile) people," or otherwise, in the comp. depopulari, ML. depopulare, with de-priv., 'deprive of people or inhabitants,' this sense being involved in the Rom. and E. words (cf. also depeople and dispeople). But the uses of the L. populari throw doubt on the assumed original connection with populus, people, and the word is by some regarded as a kind of freq. of spoliare, spoil, despoil, plunder, being in this view reduplicated (**spo- + spol-* from the base **spol-* of spolium, spoil: see spoil).] I. trans. To deprive of inhabitants, wholly or in part, whether by death or by expulsion; dispeople; reduce the population of.

Many towns and villages upon the sea coasts are, of late years, wonderfully decayed, and some wonderfully depopulated.

Grim death, in different shapes,
Depopulates the nations; thousands fall
His victims.

II. intrans. To become dispeopled. [Rare or obsolete.]

This is not the place to enter into an inquiry whether the country be depopulating or not.

Goldsmith, Des. VII., Ded.

depopulate (dē-pop'ū-lāt), a. [< L. depopulatus, pp.: see the verb.] Depopulated. [Rare.]

When the sea-mew
Flies, as once before it flew,
O'er thine isles depopulate.
Shelley, Written among the Egeanean Hills

depopulation (dē-pop'ū-lā'shōn), n. [= F. dépopulation = Sp. depopulación = Pg. depopulação = It. depopolazione, < L. depopulatio(n)-, a laying waste, plundering, < depopulari, lay waste: see depopulate, v.] The act of depopulating, or the state of being depopulated; reduction of population; destruction or expulsion of inhabitants.

It [Milan] hath suffered many devastations and depopulations.
Coryn, Creditors, I. 150.

The only remedy and amends against the depopulation and thinness of a Land within, is the borrow'd strength of firm alliance from without.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

depopulator (dē-pop'ū-lā-tōr), n. [= F. dépopulateur = Sp. depopulador = It. depopolatore, < L. depopulator, a plunderer, marauder, < depopulari, plunder: see depopulate.] One who depopulates.

Our puny depopulators allege for their doing the king's and country's good.
Fuller, Holy State, p. 27.

deport (dē-pōrt'), v. t. [< OF. deporter, bear, suffer, banish, refl. cease, desist, forbear, F. deporter = Pr. Sp. Pg. deportar = It. deportare = D. deporteren = G. deportieren = Dan. deportere = Sw. deportera, < L. deportare, carry away, get, acquire, carry off, banish, ML. also bear, suffer, favor, forbear, < de, away, + portare, carry: see port, and cf. apport, comport, export, import, report, transport, and see esp. disport.] 1. To transport or carry off; carry away, or from one country to another; specifically, to transport forcibly, as to a penal colony or a place of exile.

The only sure way of bringing about a healthy relation between the two countries [England and America] is for Englishmen to clear their minds of the notion that we are always to be treated as a kind of inferior and despised Englishman whose nature they perfectly understand.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 81.

2. To carry; demean; behave: with a reflexive pronoun.

Let an ambassador deport himself in the most graceful manner before a prince.

How do the Christians here deport them, keep Their robes of white unspotted by the world?
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 212.

deport (dē-pōrt'), n. [< OF. deport, deport, m., deport, f., deportment: from the verb.] Deportment; mien.

But Deina's self
In gait surpass'd, and goddess like deport.
Milton, P. L., ix. 380.

deportation (dē-pōrt-lā'shōn), n. [< F. déportation = Sp. deportación = Pg. deportação = It. deportazione = D. deportatie = G. Dan. Sw. deportation, < L. deportatio(n)-, a carrying away, < deportare, carry away: see deport.] A carrying away; a removing from one country to another, or to a distant place; transportation; specifically, forcible transportation, especially to a penal colony.

The wings seemed to be like the wings of a stork, another expression of that sudden transmigration and deportation
D. Stokes, Twelve Minor Prophets, p. 497.

In their [the Jews'] deportations, they had often the favour of their conquerors.

Sp. Atterbury, Horrors, III v.

Emancipation [of the slaves], even without deportation, would probably enhance the wages of white labor

deportatory (dē-pōrt-lā-tōr), n. [*L. as if *deportator*, < deportare, deport: see deport.] One who deports or transports. Davies.

This island of ours, within these late days, hath bred a great number of these field-briers, . . . oppressors, enclosers, depopulators, depravators.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 481.

deportment (dē-pōrt'mēt), n. [< OF. deportement, *F. deportement = It. deportamento, < ML. as if *deportamentum, < L. deportare*, deport: see deport.] Carriage or bearing in intercourse; manner of acting toward or before others; behavior; demeanor; conduct; management.

What's a fine person, or a beauteous face,
Unless deportment gives them decent grace?
Churchill, The Rosindal

This produced such a change in his whole deportment, that his neighbours took him to be a new man, and were amazed at his conversion from prodigious profaneness to a moral and religious life.
Southey, Bunyan, p. 16.

At these primitive tea-parties the utmost propriety and dignity of deportment prevailed.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 170.

= Syn. Carriage, Conduct, etc. See behavior.
deporture (dē-pōrt'chūr), n. [< F. déport + -ure.] Deportment. Speed.

deposable (dē-pō'zā-bl), a. [= F. déposable; as depose + -able.] Capable of being deposed or deprived of office.

deposals (dē-pō'sāl), n. [< depose + -al.] The act of deposing or divesting of office.

The short interval between the deposal and death of princes is become proverbial.
Fox, Hist. James II., p. 14.

depose (dē-pōs'), v.; pret. and pp. deposed, ppr. deposing. [< ME. deposen, lay aside, deprive of office, also intrust, < OF. deposer, F. déposer (= OSp. deposer), lay down, deposit, testify, with senses of L. deponere, pp. deponitus, lay down, etc. (see depone), but in form confused with OF. poser, ML. posuere, place; so with the other compounds, expose, compos, expose, impose, propose, repose, suggest, trans- pose: see pose. I. trans. 1. To lay down; let fall; deposit. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Take leave green yough of Otter tree, . . .
And into mist that yet not serves to Depose, and close or faste is closed as.
Palladius, Husbandrie (R. E. T. S.), p. 202.

I pray thee depose
Some small piece of silver; it shall be no loss.
B. Jonson, Utopias Metamorphosed.

The long-enduring ferns in time will all Lie and depose their dust upon the wall.
Crabbe, Works, II. 24.

24. To lay aside.

God hath deposed his wrath towards all mankind.

34. To remove; eject; evict.

We have summoned you hither, to dispossess you of those places and to depose you from those rooms, whereof indeed by virtue of our own grant, yet against reason, you are possessed.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 81.

4. To remove from office, especially from royalty, or from high executive, ecclesiastical, or judicial office; dethrone; divest of office: as, to depose a king or a bishop.

Thus when the state one Edward did depose,
A greater Edward in his room arose.
Dryden, Epistles, x., To Congress.

The Jews well know their power: ere Saul they chose,
God was their king, and God they durst depose.
Dryden, Abs. and Achil., I. 418.

They had deposed one tyrant, only to make room for a thousand.
J. Adams, Works, V. 40.

54. To take away; strip off (from one); divest (one of).

You may my glories and my state depose,
But not my griefs; still am I king of those.
Shak., Rich. II., iv. 1.

Your title speaks you nearest heaven, and points
You out a glorious reign among the angels;
Do not depose yourself of one, and be
Of the other disinherited. Shirley, The Traitor, III. 3.

6. To testify to; attest.

To depose the yearly rent or valuation of lands. Bacon.
I am ready to depose, when I shall be lawfully called, that no European did ever visit those countries before me. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iv. 12.

7. To examine on oath; take the deposition of.

Depose him in the justice of his cause.
Shak., Rich. II., I. 3.

II. intrans. 1. To bear witness.

A man might reason with us all day long, without persuading us that we slept through the day, or that we returned from a long journey, when our memory deposes otherwise. J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 181.

Specifically—2. To give testimony on oath; especially, to give testimony which is embodied in writing in a deposition or an affidavit; give answers to interrogatories intended as evidence in a court: as, he deposed to the following facts;
the witness deposes and says that, etc.

Was he that made you to depose. Shak., 3 Hen. VI., I. 2.

deposer (dē-pō'sēr), n. 1. One who deposes or degrades from office.—2. A deponent; a witness.

deposit (dē-pōz'it), v. [Formerly deposite; < OF. depositer = Sp. Pg. depositar = It. depositare, depositar, < ML. deposicare, deposit, freq.
of deponere, pp. depositus, lay aside, deposit;
see deponere and depono, and cf. deponit, n.] I. trans. 1. To lay down; place; put: as, a crocodile deposits her eggs in the sand; soil deposited by a river.

On both sides of these apartments (catacombs) are three stories of holes, big enough to deposit the bodies in.
Pococke, Description of the East, I. 9.

2. To lay away; lay in a place for preservation or safe-keeping; store: as, to deposit goods in a warehouse.

Here might be the temple of Diana, a place of security, where Hannibal deposited his vases of lead, as if they were full of money, and left carelessly in his house some brass statues, which he filled with his gold.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 223.

Stow tells us that, in his memory, great part of London Hall was appropriated to the purpose of painting and depositing the pageants for the use of the city.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 22.

3. To place for care or custody; lodge in trust; place: as, to deposit money in a bank; to deposit bonds or goods with a creditor as security.

The people with whom God thought fit to deposit these things for the benefit of the world.
Clarke, Works, II. cixiii.

44. To lay or set aside; get rid of.

If what is written prove useful to you, to the depositing that which I cannot but deem an error.
Hammond, Works, I. 704.

It has been often alleged, that the passions can never be wholly deposited.
Goldsmith, Taste.

II. intrans. To settle or be formed by deposition; descend and rest or become attached.

When the strata of the Cordilleras were depositing, there were islands which even in the latitude of Northern Chile, where now all is irremediably desolate, supported large coniferous forests. Darwin, Geol. Observations, II. 609.

When no more silver deposits on the copper, the operation is completed. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 198.

deposit (dē-pōz'it), n. [Formerly deposite (in ME. deposet, < OF. deposit, F. dépôt, > E. deposi); = Sp. Pg. It. deposito, < L. depositum (ML. also deponitum), a thing laid aside or given in trust, neut. of deponere, pp. of deponere, lay aside: see the verb.] 1. That which is laid or thrown down; matter laid down or lodged in a place, or settled by subsidence or precipitation, as from a fluid medium.

Throws the golden sands,
A rich deposit, on the border lands.
Cowper, Chantry.

Meanwhile the hours were each leaving their little deposit, and gradually forming the final reason for inaction —namely, that action was too late.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, I. 372.

Specifically—(a) In geol., any mass of material which has been thrown down from, or moved and gathered together by, water, or which has been separated from a solution by chemical agencies. Irregularity of form is rather a characteristic of a deposit; if the material be evenly and uniformly distributed, it would more generally be termed a bed or layer. The products of volcanic agencies are rarely designated by the term deposit.

The most characteristic distinction between the lacustrine and marine dolias consists in the nature of the organics remains which become imbedded in their deposits.
Lyell.

(b) In mining, the most general term for an accumulation, or "occurrence," of ore, of whatever form or nature it may be; but the word ore is generally added. (See ore-deposit.)
By some authors the term deposit is used as meaning a mode of occurrence of ore supposed to be less permanent in its character than a true vein. Thus, flat masses or sheets would often be called deposits, especially if not exhibiting any of the special characters of true or fissure veins.
(See vein.) (c) The metallic coating precipitated by galvanic action from a chemical solution upon a ground or base, as the film of gold or silver on plated articles, or of copper on copper-faced type, or the copper shell of an electrotype plate.

2. Anything intrusted to the care of another; something given into custody for safe-keeping;
specifically, money lodged in a bank for safety or convenience.

It seems your church is not so faithful a guardian of her deposit as her dear friends . . . would make us believe.
Hammond, Works, II. 1. 677.

I do not at all doubt that the arrangement is in a certain degree at haphazard, but it seems to me that there must have been a meaning in the prominence given to deposits in the Roman and Hindu law, and in the prominence assigned to thefts in the law both of the Romans and of the Malian Franks.

Meier, Early Law and Custom, p. 222.

3. A place where things are deposited; a depository. [Rare.]—4. The state or fact of being deposited or stored in the care of another; storage: as, to have money on deposit in a bank; safe deposit.—5. A pledge; a pawn; something given as security. Specifically—6. In law:
(a) A sum of money which one puts into the hands of another to secure the fulfillment of some agreement, or as a part payment in advance. (b) A naked bailment of personal property, to be kept for the bailor without recompense, and to be returned when he shall require it. (c) In Scots law, same as deposition.—74.
Deposition.

I desire that this may not be looked upon as a full and finished character, but my solemn deposit of the truth, to the best of my knowledge. Chesterfield, Miscellanies.

Certificate of deposit. See certificates.—Contract deposit. See contract.—Coralline deposits. In geol., a term applied to those recent or alluvial strata which consist of the marine lanks, shells, and islands entirely composed of coral, and thence extended to the lower Florene deposits of Suffolk, England, the white or coralline crag —Malancio deposit. See malancio.—Special deposit.
a deposit in a bank which the bank is not entitled to use, but must keep specifically to be returned.

depository (dē-pōz'it-ri), a. and n. [= F. depositaire = Sp. Pg. It. depositario, < L. depositarius, only as a noun, one who receives a trust, < L. depositum, a trust, deposit: see deposit, n.] I. a. Of deposit; receiving deposits:
said of banks.

No loss has resulted in this class of deposits for the past eighteen years, although a number of failures have taken place among the depository banks.
Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1886, p. 22.

II. n.: pl. depositories (-ris). 1. A person with whom anything is left or lodged in trust;
one to whom a thing is committed for safekeeping, or to be used for the benefit of the owner; a trustee; a guardian. Also depository.
For a hundred years they [the Puritans] were the sole depositories of the sacred fire of liberty in England.
A. Choate, Addresses, p. 47.

The Liverpool house was the authorized depository of Confederate funds in Europe.
J. H. Sturge, Blockade and Cruisers, p. 122.

The first apostles alone were the depositories of the pure and perfect evangel.
Brudenbury, Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 170.

2. In law, a bailee of personal property, to be kept by him for the bailor without recompense.
depositate (dē-pōz'it-tāt), a. [ML. depositatus, pp.: see deponit, v.] Deposited.

A marble inscription . . . signifying that his corpse is deposite within. Woodrow (Correspondence), III. 26.

deposition (dē-pōz-i-tā'shon), n. [ML.
as if **depositatio* (n.), < deponere, deposit: see deponit, v.] In Scots law, a contract by which something belonging to one person is intrusted to the gratuitous custody of another (called the depository), to be redelivered on demand. A proper deposition is one where a special subject is deposited, to be restored without alteration. An improper deposition is one where money or other fungibles are deposited, to be returned in kind. Also deposi.

depositing-dock (dē-pōz'it-ing-dok), n. See dock.

deposition (dē-pōz'it-ing), n. [OF. depositetion, F. deposition = Sp. deposición = Pg. deposi-ção = It. deposizione, < L. depositio (n.), a laying down, < L. deponere, pp. depositus, lay down, deposit: see deponit, v.] 1. The act of depositing; a laying down; lodgment or precipitation: as, the deposition of stones by a moving glacier, or of sediment by a river; the deposition of a metallic coating by galvanism.

A benefactress to the convent, happening to die, was desirous of being buried in the cloister. . . . The society considered the deposition of their benefactress among them as a very great honour.
Goldsmith, Cyrillo Padovano.

The sediment brought down from the land would only prevent the growth of the coral in the line of its deposition.
Darwin, Coral Reefs, p. 22.

The deposition of a delta is the work of tens of thousands of years.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 372.

2. That which is deposited or placed; a deposit. [Rare.]—34. The act of laying down or bringing to notice; presentation.

The influence of princes upon the dispositions of their courts needs not the deposition of their examples, since it hath the authority of a known principle.
W. Montague, Devouta Kanays, I. ix. § 2.

4. Declaration; assertion; specifically, in law, testimony taken under interrogatories, written or oral, before an authorized officer, to be used as a substitute for the production of the witness in open court. The term is sometimes loosely used to include affidavits, which are ex-parte statements in writing, sworn to, but not taken judicially or quasi-judicially, as are depositions strictly so called. In a deposition there may have been cross-examination; in an affidavit, none.
A deposition is evidence; an affidavit may be evidence.

If you will examine the veracity of the fathers by those circumstances usually considered in depositions, you will find them strong on their side.
Sir K. Digby.

5. In civil and common law: (a) A deposit; a naked bailment of goods, to be kept for the bailor without reward, and to be returned when he shall require it, or delivered according to the object or purpose of the original trust.
Story, Bailments, iv. 41. (b) The thing so deposited.—6. The act of depositing a person from an office, or of depriving him of a dignity; specifically, the act of dethroning, or of removing from some important office or trust.

After his deposition by the council of Lyons, the affairs of Frederic II. went rapidly into decay.
Hallam, Middle Ages, vii. 2.

74. In surg., the depression of the lens of the eye in the operation of couching.—8. The burial of a saint's body, or the act of transferring his remains or relics to a new resting-place or shrine; the festival commemorating such burial or translation: as, the Deposition of St. Martin.—Deposition from the cross, the taking down of Christ's body from the cross, or the representation of that act in a work of art.—Syn. & Testimony, etc. See evidence.
depositive (dē-pōz'it-tiv), a. [= OF. depositif;
as deposit + -ive.] Depositing; tending to deposit: in pathol., applied to inflammation of the corium when the effusion of lymph into that membrane gives rise to small, hard elevations or pimples on the surface.

depositor (dē-pōz'it-ōr), n. [= F. depositeur, < L. depositor, < L. deponere, pp. depositus, deposit: see deponit, v.] One who makes a deposit; specifically, one who deposits money in a bank.

It is ordained by the sages of Hindustan that a depositor shall carefully enquire into the character of his intended depository; who, if he undertake to keep the goods, shall preserve them with care and attention.
Sir W. Jones, Law of Bailments.

Savings Banks, where the smallest sums are placed in perfect safety . . . and are paid . . . the moment they are demanded by the depositor.
McCulloch, Com. Dict.

depository (dē-pōz'i-tō-ri), n.; pl. depositories (-rīz). [*< ML. *depositorium, a place of deposit, < L. depositus, pp. of deponere, deposit.*]

1. A place where anything is lodged for safe-keeping: as, a warehouse is a depository for goods.

It may be said . . . that the Constitutional Monarch is only a depository of power, as an armory is a depository of arms; but that those who wield the arms, and those alone, constitute the true governing authority.

2. [Prop. depository.] A person to whom a thing is intrusted for safe-keeping; a depository. [Rare.]

If I am a vain man, my gratification lies within a narrow circle. I am the sole depository of my own secret, and it shall perish with me.
Junius, Letters, Dod.

One who was the director of the national finances, and the depository of the gravest secrets of state, might render inestimable services.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xlii.

deposit-receipt (dē-pōz'it-rē-sēt'), n. A note or an acknowledgment for money lodged with a banker for a stipulated time, on which a higher rate of interest is allowed than on the balance of a current account.

deposit, n. An obsolete form of deposit.

For depravation.
Shak., T. and C., v. 2.

That learning should undermine the reverence of laws and government . . . is assuredly a mere depravation and calumny.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 23.

2. The act of making or becoming bad or worse; the act or process of debasement; deterioration.

It is to these . . . (circumstances) that the depravation of ancient polite learning is principally to be ascribed.
Goldsmith, Polite Learning, II.

3. Depraved or corrupt quality or character; degeneracy; depravity.

Notwithstanding this universal depravation of manners, behold how untouched he [Noah] stood, and what a character he bore!
Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. iv.

4. A depraved tendency; inclination toward evil or corruption. [Rare.]

What befell Asdrubal or Cesar Borgia is as much an illustration of the mind's powers and depravations as what has befallen us.
Emerson, History.

—Syn. Depravity, Depravation, deterioration, corruption, vitiation, contamination, debasement. Depravation is especially the act of depraving or the process of becoming depraved; depravity, the state resulting from the act or process. The use of depravation for depravity is uncommon.

Its coarseness [that of Dryden's day] was not external, like that of Elizabeth a day, but the outward mark of an inward depravity.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 32.

I do not believe there ever was put upon record more depravation of Man, and more despicable frivolity of thought and aim in Woman, than in the novels which purport to give the picture of English fashionable life.
Mary Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 130.

deprave (dē-prāv'), v. t.; pret. and pp. depraved, ppr. depraving. [*< ME. depraven, < OF. depraver, pervert, calumniate, accuse, F. depraver = Sp. Unjustly thou depraves it with the name Of servitude, to serve whom God ordains

2. To make bad or worse; pervert; vitiate; corrupt: as, to deprave the heart, mind, understanding, will, tastes, etc.; to deprave the morals, government, laws, etc.

Whose pride depraves each other better part Spenser, Sonnets, xxix.

All things proceed, and up to him return,
If not depraved from good.
Milton, P. L., v. 471.

The ingenuity once so conspicuously displayed in every department of physical and moral science has been depraved into a timid and servile cunning.
Macaulay, Moore's Byron.

The ceremony of kneeling at the sacrament was included among the rest: but the fear and glass acknowledgment of that ceremony was not to be expected from one who had notoriously depraved it.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xx.

depraved (dē-prāv'd'), p. a. 1. Perverted; vitiated: as, a depraved appetite.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

Specifically—2. In theol., the hereditary tendency of mankind, derived from Adam through his descendants, to commit sin; original sin. By many theologians depravity is distinguished from actual sin, which they regard as consisting wholly in voluntary action.—Total depravity, in theol., the total unfitness of man for the moral purposes of his being until born again by the influence of the Spirit of God. In defining the nature of this unfitness theologians disagree. Some consider man as "utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposed to all that is spiritually good, and wholly inclined to evil and that continually" (West. Conf. of Faith). Others concede to man certain natural traits of character which are innocent, amiable, or even commendable, but hold that the moral character is determined by the controlling energy and disposition, which is by nature totally different or adverse to the law of God.—Syn. 1 and 2. Depravity, Depravation. See depravation.—2. Profligacy, baseness, degeneracy, vice, demoralization.

deprecable (dep'rē-kā-bl), a. [= It. deprecabile, < L. deprecabilis, that may be entreated, < L. deprecari, pray against, pray for: see deprecate.] That is to be deprecated.

I look upon the temporal destruction of the greatest king as far less deprecable than the eternal damnation of the meanest subject.

deprecate (dep'rē-kāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deprecated, ppr. deprecating. [< L. deprecatus, pp. of deprecari (> Sp. Pg. deprecar, pray against (a present or impending evil), pray for, intercede for (that which is in danger), rarely imprecate, < de, off, + precari, pray: see pray.] 1. To pray against; pray or entreat the removal or prevention of; pray or desire deliverance from.

We are not here to acknowledge our sin, to express our public detestation of it, and to deprecate the vengeance which hath pursued, and doth still, I fear, pursue us on the account of it.
Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xiii.

The judgments which we would deprecate are not removed.
Sp. Smalridge.

2. To plead or argue earnestly against; urge reasons against; express disapproval of: said of a scheme, purpose, and the like.

His purpose was depraved by all around him, and he was with difficulty induced to abandon it.
Scott.

The self-dependence which was honored in me is deprecated as a fault in most women.
Mary Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 40.

O, still as ever, friends are they
Who, in the interest of outraged truth,
Depricate such rough handling of a lie,
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 227.

3. To imprecate; invoke.

Upon the heads of these very mischievous men they depricated no vengeance, though that of the whole nation was justly merited.
Franklin, Autobiog., p. 442.

The act of deprecating something, as harm or disapproval; counter-prayer or petition; earnest desire for exemption or deliverance.

I, with leave of speech implored,
And humble deprecation, thus replied.
Milton, P. L., viii. 378.

Sternutation they generally conceived to be a good sign, or a bad one; and so, upon this motion, they commonly used a gratulation for the one, and a deprecation for the other.
Sir T. Browne.

They use no deprecations nor complaints,
Nor suit for mercy.

Specifically—2. In litanies, a petition to be delivered from some evil, temporal or spiritual. In Latin litanies each single deprecation is usually followed by the response, "Libera nos, Domine" (Deliver us, O Lord). In the Anglican litany the deprecations begin, "From all evil and mischief," and end, "From hardness of heart, and contempt of thy Word and Commandment," and are collected in groups, after each of which comes the response, "Good Lord, deliver us." The observations, which succeed, have the same response. See litany.

3. A praying for removal or prevention; entreaty or earnest desire for an averting or delaying: as, to urge reasons in deprecation of war or of a severe judgment; "deprecation of death," Donne.—4. An imprecation; a curse.

7. In painting, darkness and richness of tone: as, great depth of color.—8. In logic, the quantity of comprehension; the totality of those attributes which an idea involves in itself, and which cannot be taken away from it without destroying it. This use of the word was borrowed by Hamilton from certain late Greek writers.

By the informed depth of a term, I mean all the real characters (in contradistinction to mere names) which can be predicated of it (with logical truth on the whole) in a supposed state of information; no character being counted twice over knowingly in the supposed state of information. The depth, like the breadth, may be certain or doubtful, actual or potential. By the essential depth of a term, I mean the really conceivable qualities predicated of it in its definition. Substantial depth is the real concrete form which belongs to everything of which a term is predicable with absolute truth.

C. S. Peirce.

Beyond one's depth, in water too deep for safety; hence, beyond one's ability or means.

I have ventured,

Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
This many summers in a sea of glory,
But far beyond my depth. Shak., Hen. VIII., III. 2.

Be sure yourself and your own reach to know;
How far your genius, taste, and learning go;

E. depute*, debyte, OF. depute, F. député = Sp. diputado = Pg. deputado = It. deputato, ML. deputatus, a deputy, prop. pp. of deputare, depute; see depute.] I. n.; pl. deputies (-tiz). 1. A person appointed or elected to act for another or others; one who exercises an office in another's right; a lieutenant or substitute.

The vicar and deputy of Christ. J. Udall, On Revelations xvii.

He hath committed this other office of preserving in healthful constitution the inner-man, which may be term'd the spirit of the soul, to his spiritual deputy, the minister of each Congregation. Milton, Church-Government, II. 2.

Specifically—2. One deputed to represent a body of electors; one elected to the office of representative: as, the deputies to the French Chamber of Deputies.

Each district has now its respective deputy to the general diet, although the canon has but one vote, and consequently loses its voice if the two deputies are of different opinions.

J. Adams, Works, IV. 314.

That certain men have been chosen as deputies of the people—that there is a piece of paper stating such deputies to possess certain powers—these circumstances in themselves constitute no security for good government.

Manning, Utilitarian Theory of Government.

Dere fadir, lyff is full o' dree,
The dree of dore dore all my dree.
York Plays, p. 65.

deralist (der-ə-lik), a. and n. [= Pg. deralisto = It. derallito, < L. deralotus, pp. of deralotus, forsake utterly, < de- + relinquo, forsake, abandon: see relict, relinquent, relinquish.] I. a. 1. Left; abandoned by the owner or guardian. [Now rare except in law.]

Taking out a patent in Charles the Second's time for deralist lands. Sir P. Pett, Letters, To A. Wood, I. 611.

The affections which these exposed or deralist children bear to their mothers have no grounds of nature or assiduity, but dillity and opinion.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1838), I. 40.

9. Unfaithful; neglectful of requirement or responsibility: as, deralist in duty.

The vacant, unoccupied, and deralist minds of his friends.

It was generally admitted that Mr. Grant was hopelessly deralist, and neglectful of his social duties.

J. Hawthorne, Dust, p. 108.

II. n. 1. That which is abandoned; in law, an article of goods or any commodity thrown away, relinquished, or abandoned by the owner; specifically, a vessel abandoned at sea.

When I am a little disposed to a gay turn of thinking, I consider, as I was a deralist from my cradle, I have the honour of a lawful claim to the heat protection in Europe.

The crown [of Jerusalem] became a deralist; the title was borne after Conrad by his half-brother Henry, the son of Isabella of England; and subsequently by a number of ruling houses.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 176.

The cruiser Atlanta towed into the Cape of Delaware a dangerous deralist which had been drifting about off the coast for weeks.

New York Tribune, Nov. 20, 1887.

2. Land left dry by a change of the water-line. dereliction (der-ə-lik'ah-n), n. [= Pg. derelicto, < L. derelictio (n.), an abandoning, < derelictus, pp. of derelinquo, abandon: see derelict.] 1. The act of leaving with an intention not to reclaim or resume; an utter forsaking; abandonment. [Now rare except in law.]

When the man repents, he is absolved before God, before the sentence of the church, upon his contrition and dereliction only.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, v. 4.

2. The state of being forsaken or abandoned.

Hadst thou not been thus forsaken, we had perished; thy dereliction is our safety.

Sp. Hall.

3. The gaining of land from the water by a change of the water-line.—4. The land so gained.—5. Unfaithfulness or remissness; neglect: as, a dereliction of duty.

The pretence was the Persian war, which Argos declined. This was called a base dereliction, and excused, by the help of Spartan emissaries, hatred and contempt.

J. Adams, Works, IV. 511.

—Syn. 1. Desertion, relinquishment.—8. Failure, unfaithfulness.

dereligionize (der-rē-līj'ōn-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dereligionized, ppr. dereligionizing. [de- + religionize.] To make irreligious; oppose or discourage religion in or among. [Rare.]

He would dereligionize men beyond all others.

De Quincey.

derelict, n. An obsolete form of derelict.

derelict, v. t. A variant form of derelict.

derf, a. [ME., also derf, prob. (the AS. **deorf*, ONorth. **dearf*, not being authenticated) < Icel. dearf = Sw. derf = Dan. derf, bold, daring, = (with additional suffix) OS. derbit = OFries. derve, bold, fierce.] Bold; brave; strong; mighty; terrible.

"Do way," quoth that derf mon. "My derf, that speche. For that durst I not do, lest I dismayed were."

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (R. B. T. S.), I. 1402.

Doughty of derf, derf of his honours,
None wigher in warre, no of wille better.

Destraction of Troy (R. B. T. S.), I. 8216.

derf, adv. [ME., also derflike, derflike, etc. (= Icel. derflega); < derf + -ly.] Boldly; bravely; sorely; greatly.

I dare like no man in the face,
Dearly for dore why we were I dore.

York Plays, p. 107.

derham (der'gm), n. [Also dirhem; Ar. dirham, dirhem, Turk. dirhem, Pers. dirham, diram, < Gr. δραχμή, a drachma: see drachma, drachm, drum.] An Arabian weight and silver coin, intended originally to be two thirds of an Attic drachma (44.4 grains troy); a dram. Its value was fixed, not by reference to a prototype, but by the rule that  $\frac{1}{4}$  part of a derham should weigh as much as 70 average grains of mustard-seed. There was a difference between the monetary and ponderal (Arabic heli) derham. The former, by weightings of numerous early coins, has been found equal to 43.7 grains troy, making the value of the coin about 9 United States cents; while the latter is said to be heavier in the ratio of 10 to 9, so that it would be 48 grains. This is still approximately the mass of the derham (weight) in most localities; though in some places it sinks nearly to 40 and in others rises almost to 60 grains, and in Abyssinia is even said to be only 40 or 41 grains. There was in early times a derham of half the usual weight, and two units of this name now employed in Persia are equal to nearly 150 and 300 grains respectively. The Morocco coin, the derham, is reckoned equivalent to  $\frac{1}{7}$  United States cents.

deris (der'ik), n. [Gr. δέρις, skin, + -a.] In embryol., or of pertaining to the ectoderm, or outer germ-layer: the opposite of enteric.

The Fungi which spread in the deris tissues of the higher animals.

De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 360.

deride (dē-rī'd), v. t.; pret. and pp. derided, ppr. deriding. [= OF. derider, derire, F. dial. derire = It. deridere, deridere, < L. deridere, mock, laugh at, < de- + ridere, laugh: see ridicule, risible. Cf. arride.] To laugh at in contempt; turn to ridicule or make sport of; mock; treat with scorn by laughter.

The Pharisees also . . . derided him.

Luke xvi. 14.

Men have rather sought by wit to deride and traduce much of that which is good in professions, than with judgment to discover and sever that which is corrupt.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 251.

—Syn. Ridicule, etc. (see taunt), banter, rally, jeer, gibe, scout, scoff at, insult.

derider (dē-rī'dēr), n. One who derides; a mocker; a scoffer.

Execrable blasphemies, and like contempt offered by deriders of religion.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

deridingly (dē-rī'ding-ly), adv. By way of derision or mockery.

His parasite was wont deridingly to advise him.

Sp. Reynolds, On the Passions, xxvii.

derisible (dē-ris'ī-bl), a. [= It. derisibile, < L. as if **derisibilis*, < deridere, pp. derisus, laugh at, deride: see deride.] Subject to derision; worthy of derision.

In every point of intellectual character I was his hopeless and derisible inferior.

R. L. Stevenson, The Dynamiter, p. 71.

derision (dē-rish'ōn), n. [= F. derision = Pr. derissio = It. derisione, derisione, < L. derisio (n.), < L. deridere, pp. derisus, laugh at, deride: see deride.] 1. The act of deriding; subjection to ridicule or mockery; contempt manifested by laughter; scorn.

He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision.

Ps. II. 4.

British policy is brought into derision in those nations that a while ago trembled at the power of our arms.

Burke, Present Discontents.

2. An object of derision or contempt; a laughing-stock.

I was a derision to all my people.

Iam. III. 14.

—Syn. 1. Ridicule, mockery, gibe, scoffing, taunts, insults.

derisionary (dē-rish'ōn-ē-ri), a. [< derision + -ary.] Derisive. [Rare.]

There was a club that ate a calf's head on January 30, in ridicule of the commemoration of Charles I.'s death. This is spoken of as "that derisionary festival."

Tom Brown, Works, II. 215.

derisive (dē-rī'siv), a. [= OF. derisief = It. derisivo, < L. as if **derisivus*, < derisus, pp. of deridere, laugh at, deride: see deride.] Expressing or characterized by derision; mocking; ridiculing.

His (Christ's) head harrowed with the thorns, and his derisive purple stained, you dashed, with blood.

Sp. Gordon, On the Sacrament, p. 32.

Manlike, o'er all the dome they quaff, they feast,
Derisive taunts were spread from guest to guest,
And each in jovial mood his mate addressed.

Pope, Odyssey, II.

derisively (dē-rī'siv-ly), adv. With derision or mockery.

The Persians . . . [were] thence called Magusian derisively by other ethnics.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 248.

derisiveness (dē-rī'siv-ness), n. The state of being derisive. Imp. Dict.

derisory (dē-rī'sē-ri), a. [= F. derisoire = Fr. derisoir = It. derisorio, < L. derisorius, serving for laughter, < L. deridere, pp. derisus, deride: see deride.] Characterized by derision; mocking; ridiculing.

The comical or derisory manner is further still from making show of method.

Shafesbury, Advice to an Author, II. § 2.

derivability (dē-rī-vā-bil'ī-ti), n. [< derivable: see -ibility.] The character of being derivable.

A derivability of the one from the other.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 3d ser., XXXII. 380.

derivable (dē-rī-vā-bl), a. [= F. derivable = Sp. derivable; as derivo + -able.] Capable of being derived, received, or obtained. (a) Obtainable, as from a source: as, income is derivable from land, money, or stock; an estate derivable from an ancestor.

He here confounds the pleasure derivable from sweet sounds with the capacity for creating them.

Pea, Tales, I. 360.

Having disregarded the warning derivable from common experience, he was answerable for the consequences.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 47.

(b) Traceable, as to a source; obtainable by derivation: as, a word derivable from the Greek. (c) Deducible, as from premises.

The second sort of arguments . . . are derivable from some of these heads.

Wittke.

derivably (dē-rī-vā-bl), adv. By derivation. derivant (der'ī-vānt), n. [< L. derivant (t), ppr. of derivare, derive: see derive.] In math., a homogeneous and isobaric function of f, which is a covariant of f, where f denotes derivate (der'ī-vāt), a. and n. [= F. derivé = Sp. Pg. derivado = It. derivato (= G. Dan. Sw. derivatum, Sw. also derivat, n.), < L. derivatus (neut. derivatum, in NL. as a noun), pp. of derivare, derive: see the verb.] I. a. Derived. [Rare.]

Putting trust in Him
From whom the rights of kings are derivate,
In its own blood to trample treason out.

Sir H. Taylor, Edwin the Fair, I. 7.

II. n. A word derived from another; a derivative. [Rare.]

derivation (der-ī-vā'shōn), n. [= OF. derivation, derivation, derivation, F. derivation = Sp. derivacion = Pg. derivação = It. derivazione = G. Dan. Sw. derivation, < L. derivatio (n.), derivation, < derivare, pp. derivatus, derive: see derive.] 1. A drawing from or turning aside, as a stream of water or other fluid from a natural course or channel; a stream so diverted. [Obsolete or archaic.]

These issues and derivations being once made, and supplied with new waters pushing them forwards, would continue their course till they arrived at the sea, just as other rivers do.

T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

An artificial derivation of that river.

Gibson.

Specifically—(a) In med., revulsion, or the drawing away of the fluids of an inflamed part, by applying blisters, etc., over it or at a distance from it. (b) In telegr., a diversion of the electric current.

In telegraphy, derivations generally arise from the wire touching another conductor.

R. S. Culley, Pract. Teleg., p. 43.

2. The act or fact of deriving, drawing, or receiving from a source: as, the derivation of being; the derivation of an estate from ancestors, or of profits from capital.

My derivation was from ancestors
Who stood equivalent with mighty kings.

Shak., Pericles, v. 1.

Shrubs and flowers, indigenous or of distant derivation.

P. Robinson, Under the Sun, p. 17.

3. In philol., the drawing or tracing of a word in its development or formation from its more original root or stem; a statement of the origin or formative history of a word. See etymology.

Derivation, in its broadest sense, includes all processes by which new words are formed from given roots.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., p. 123.

4. In math.: (a) The operation of finding the derivative, or differential coefficient; differentiation. (b) The operation of passing from any point on a cubic curve to that point at which the tangent at the first point cuts the curve. (c) The operation of passing from any function to any related function which may in the context be termed its derivative. The word derivation, in its first mathematical sense, was invented by Lagrange, who thought it possible to develop the calculus without the use of infinitesimals.

5. In biol., descent with modification of an organism from antecedent organisms; evolution: as, the derivation of man; the doctrine of derivation—that is, the derivative theory (which see, under derivative).

According to the doctrine of derivation, the more complex plants and animals are the slowly modified descendants of less complex plants and animals, and these in turn were the slowly modified descendants of still less complex plants and animals, and so on until we converge to those primitive organisms which are not definable either as animal or as vegetable, but which in their lowest forms are mere shreds of jelly-like protoplasm.

J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 442.

6. In gun., the peculiar constant deviation of an elongated projectile from a rifled gun, due to its angular rotation about its longer axis and to the resistance of the air. Sometimes called drift.—7. The thing derived or deduced; a derivative; a deduction. [Rare or obsolete.]

Most of them are the genuine derivations of the hypothesis they lay claim to.

Glanville.

Arbogast's calculus of derivations [named for the French analyst F. A. Arbogast, 1759-1803], a method of expanding and otherwise dealing with functions of functions expressible as series in ascending powers of one or more variables.

derivational (der-i-vā'shən-əl), a. [derivation + -al.] Relating to derivation.

derivationist (der-i-vā'shən-ist), n. [derivation + -ist.] Same as derivative.

We have sometimes in the preceding pages used the words evolutionist or derivationist.

Le Conte, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 311.

derivatist (dē-riv'g-tist), n. [derivative + -ist.] A believer in the doctrine of derivation or evolution; an evolutionist. [Rare.]

The doctrine of evolution of organic types is sometimes appropriately called the doctrine of derivation, and its supporters derivatists.

E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 215.

derivative (dē-riv'g-tiv), a. and n. [= F. dérivatif = Sp. lt. derivativo, < L. derivativus, derivative (in grammatical sense), < L. derivare, derive: see derive.] 1. Derived; taken or having proceeded from another or something preceding; secondary: as, a derivative word; a derivative conveyance.

As it is a derivative perfection, so it is a distinct kind of perfection from that which is in God.

St. M. Hale.

Exclusive sovereignty of ownership of the soil is a derivative right.

Storrs, Salen, Sept. 18, 1832.

Making the authority of law derivative, and not original.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 19.

2. In biol., relating to derivation, or to the doctrine of derivation: as, the derivative theory.—3. In med., having a tendency to lessen inflammation or reduce a morbid process.

Kewy, Brit., XII. 544.

Derivative certainty. See certainty. Derivative character. See character. Derivative chord, in mus., a chord derived from a fundamental chord; specifically, a chord derived from another by inversion; an inversion.—Derivative conveyance. See conveyance. Derivative function, in math., a function expressing the rate of change of the value of another function relatively to that of the variable.—Derivative theory, in biol., the view that species change in the course of time by virtue of their inherent tendencies, not by natural selection.

Fundamental and Derivative Chords

II. n. 1. In med., a therapeutic method or agent employed to lessen a morbid process in one part by producing a flow of blood or lymph to another part, as cupping, leeching, blisters, catharsis, etc.—2. That which is derived; that which is deduced or comes by derivation from another.

For honour,

'Tis a derivative from me to mine.

Shak., W. T., III. 2.

Specifically—3. A word derived or formed either immediately from another, or remotely from a primitive or root: thus, 'verb,' 'verbal,' 'verbous' are derivatives of the Latin verbum; 'duke,' 'duet,' 'adduce,' 'conduce,' 'conduit,' 'conduit,' etc., are derivatives of the Latin ducere; 'feeder' is a derivative of 'feed,' and 'feed' a derivative of 'food.' See derivation, 3.—4. In music: (a) The root or generator from which a chord is derived. (b) Same as derivative chord (which see, above).—5. In math.: (a) A derivative function; a differential coefficient. (b) The slope of a scalar function; a vector function whose direction is that of most rapid increase of a scalar function (of which it is said to be the derivative), and whose magnitude is equal to the increase in this direction of the scalar function per unit of distance. (c) More generally, any function derived from another.

Derivative of a manifold of points, the aggregate of all points having a number of points of the manifold greater than any assignable number within any assigned distance, however small.—Rational derivative of a point on a plane cubic curve, a point whose trilinear coordinates are rational integral functions of those of the former point.—Schwarzian derivative of any function  $y$  of  $x$ , the function where the accents signify differentiations relative to  $x$ .

derivatively (dē-riv'g-tiv-ly), adv. In a derivative manner; by derivation.

The character which essentially and inherently belongs only to him [Christ] will derivatively belong to them [his disciples] also.

Howe, On Pa., v.

derivativeness (dē-riv'g-tiv-ness), n. The state of being derivative. Imp. Dict.

derive (dē-riv'), v.; pret. and pp. derived, ppr. deriving. [ME. derivien, < OF. derivier, F. derivier = Sp. lg. derivar = lt. derivare = G. derivieren = Dan. derivere = Sw. derivera, < L. derivare, lead, turn, or draw off (a liquid), draw off, derive (one word from another, in last sense for earlier ducere), < de, away, + rivus, a stream: see rival.] 1. trans. 1. To turn aside or divert, as water or other fluid, from its natural course or channel: as, to derive water from the main channel or current into lateral rivulets.

The solemn and right manner of deriving the water.

Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 190.

The whole pond is very great; but that part of it which is derived towards this font is but little.

Curpat, Credulities, I. 36.

2. Figuratively, to turn aside; divert.

And her dew loves deriv'd to that vile witch's shayre.

Spenser, F. Q., I. iii. 2.

That saving grace which Christ originally is or hath for the general good of his whole Church, by sacraments he severally deriveth into every member thereof.

Hooker, Reclia. Polity, p. 57.

The Siamites are the sink of the Eastern Superstitions, which they derive to many Nations.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 401.

If we take care that the sickness of the body derive not itself into the soul, nor the pains of one procure impatience of the other, we shall alleviate the burden.

J. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 332.

3. To draw or receive, as from a source or origin, or by regular transmission: as, to derive ideas from the senses; to derive instruction from a book; his estate is derived from his ancestors.

For by my mother I derived am

From Lionel duke of Clarence.

Shak., I. Hen. VI., II. 5.

Elizabeth clearly discerned the advantages which were to be derived from a close connection between the monarchy and the priesthood.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

It is from Rome and Germany that we derive our domestic law.

W. E. Hall, Aryan Household, p. 180.

Specifically—4. To draw or receive (a word) from a more original root or stem: as, the word 'rule' is derived from the Latin; 'feed' is derived from 'food.' See derivation, 3.—5. To deduce, as from premises; trace, as from a source or origin: involving a personal subject.

A sound mind will derive its principles from insight.

Emerson, Society and Solitude.

These men derive all religion from myths.

Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 202.

I should be much obliged if any of your readers could help me in deriving the name of the village of Allonby, in Cumberland.

N. and Q., 6th ser., IX. 207.

6. To communicate or transfer from one to another, as by descent. [Rare.]

His [Bathurst's] learning, and untainted manners, too, We find, Athenians, are derived to you.

Dryden, Epilogue spoken at Oxford, l. 22.

Our language has received innumerable elegancies and improvements from that infusion of Hebrewisms which are derived to it out of the passages of Holy Writ. Addition.

The plaintiff could not prove the place in question to be within his patent, nor could derive a good title of the patent itself to Mr. Higby.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 314.

An excellent disposition is derived to your lordship from the parents of two generations.

Friton.

Derived conductors, in elec., the two or more branches, counting further along, into which a conductor is sometimes divided.—Derived current, in elec., a current flowing through a derived conductor.—Derived group. See group.

II. *trans. To come, proceed, or be derived. [Rare.]

It were but reasonable to admire Him, from whom really all perfections do derive.

J. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 22.

*For't from heav'n's Derives, and monarchs rule by gods appointed.
Prior, Second Hymn of Callimachus.*
The wish, that of the living whole
No life may fall beyond the grave, Derive it not from what we have The likeliest God within the soul!

Tranquon, in Memorial, lv.

The new school derives from Hawthorne and George Eliot.

derivement (dē-riv'ment), n. [OF. derivement, derivation (in lit. sense), < deriver, derive: see derive and -ment.] An inference or a deduction.

I offer these derivements from these subjects, to raise our affections upward.

W. Montague, Devout Essays, II. iv. 4.

deriver (dē-riv'vēr), n. 1. One who derives or deduces from a source.—2. One who diverts a thing from its natural course to or upon something else. [Rare.]

Such a one makes a man not only a partaker of other men's sins, but also a deriver of the whole entire guilt of them to himself.

South, Sermons, II. 6.

derkt, a., n., and v. An obsolete form of dark.

Chaucer.

derling, n. A Middle English form of darling.

derm (dērm), n. [NL. derma, q. v.] Same as derma.

derma (dēr'mg), n. [NL., < Gr. déipma, the skin, hide (of beasts, later of man), < dēipiv, skin, flay, = E. tear, q. v.] 1. The true skin, or cutis vera; the corium.—2. Skin; the skin in general: synonymous with integument or tegumentum.

Also derm, dermis.

dermad (dēr'mad), adv. [Gr. déipma, skin, + ad, to: see -ad.] Toward the skin—that is, from within outward in any direction; eadad. Barclay.

dermahemal, dermahemal, a. See dermohe-mal.

dermal (dēr'mal), a. [derma + -al.] 1. In zool., pertaining to skin, or the external covering of the body; consisting of skin; cutaneous; tegumentary. The word properly relates to the derma or corium: as, the dermal layer of the skin; but it has also acquired a more general sense: as, dermal appendages—that is, hair, feathers, etc.; the dermal skeleton.

2. In bot., pertaining to the epidermis.—Dermal bone, an ossification in the derma or cutis.—Dermal defenses, in icht., the placoid exoskeleton; the shagreen, lithiodontolites, etc., of elasmobranchiate fishes.—Dermal denticle. See denticle.—Dermal muscle, a cutaneous or subcutaneous muscle; a muscle developed in, attached to, or specially acting upon the derma or skin proper, as the platysma myoides of man.

As we regard the dermal muscles as primitively forming a common complex with those which belong to the skeleton, we must distinguish from it those which belong to the integument as such.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 492.

Dermal musculature, the set or system of dermal muscles as a whole; cutaneous muscles, collectively considered.

The dermal musculature is more highly developed in mammals.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 493.

Dermal skeleton, the exoskeleton of an animal, or those hard parts which cover the body, as the integument of an insect or a crustacean.

dermalgia (dēr-mal'jē-gē), n. [NL., < Gr. déipma, skin, + álgos, pain.] In pathol., a painful condition of the skin arising from nervous disease; neuralgia of the skin. Also dermatalgia.

Dermalichus (dēr-mā-lē'kus), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. déipma, skin, + leichen, lichen.] A genus of parasitic mites or acarids, of the family Sarcoptidae, or itch-insects, founded by Koch, 1843: synonymous with Analogus.

The species are mainly parasitic on birds. The larvae are hexapod, the adults octopod; the male is larger than the female, and is often provided with enlarged legs, especially the third pair. The species here figured feeds upon the oyster-shell bark-house of the apple. Also Dermatichus.

dermaneur, a. See dermonneur.

Dermoptera (dēr-māp'tē-rē), n. pl. [NL., prop. Dermoptera (which is in use in another application), neut. pl. of dermopteris, < Gr. déipma, skin, + pteron, wing, as a bat: see dermopterous.] 1. An old and disused group of insects; in De Geer's system, one of three groups (the others being Hemiptera and Cole- optera) of his Faginata.—2. The earwig, Forficulidae, as an order of Insecta: now usually called Dermaptera (which see). Kirby.

Also Dermatoptera.

dermapteran (dér-máp'té-ran), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Dermoptera.

II. n. One of the Dermoptera.

dermapterous (dér-máp'té-rus), a. Of or pertaining to the Dermoptera.

dermatitis (dér-má-tá'ti-s), n. Same as dermatitis.

Dermatemydidae (dér-má-te-míd'i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Dermatemyd (-temyd-) + -idae.] In Gray's classification, a family of cryptodirous tortoises, typified by the genus Dermatemyd. It includes those which have the alveolar surface of the upper jaw surmounted by a triangular ridge parallel to the proper edge of the jaw, and a short transverse ridge attached in the middle in front and separated from the front by a deep pit; the lower jaw with 3 or 5 strong teeth in front fitting into a pit in the upper jaw; and the alveolar surface flat, with a subcentral groove along each side. The teeth are weak and broadly webbed. The group includes several fresh-water tortoises of Central and South America, and some fossil species have also been (erroneously) referred to it. By most chelonologists the group is referred to the family Emydidae. Also Dermatemydinae.

Dermatemydinae (dér-má-tam-i-dí-né), n. pl. [NL., < Dermatemyd (-temyd-) + -inae.] A subfamily of emydid tortoises. Also Dermatemydinae.

Dermatemyd (dér-má-té-mis), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1847), < Gr. déma(-), skin, + myd (mýd-), the fresh-water tortoise.] The typical genus of Dermatemydidae.

dermatic (dér-má'tik), a. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + derma(-), skin: see derma.] Dermal; cutaneous; pertaining to the skin. Also dermatine.

dermatine (dér-má'tin), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -in, -ness.] A dark olive-green variety of hydropyrite, of a resinous luster, found in Saxony: so called because it frequently occurs as a skin or crust upon serpentine. It also occurs in reniform masses.

dermatine (dér-má'tin), a. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -in, -ness.] Same as dermatic.

dermatitis (dér-má'ti-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the skin. Also called cutitis.

Dermatobranchia, Dermatobranchiata (dér-má-tó-brang'ki-gá, -brang'ki-s'té), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + bráxyia, gills.] Same as Dermobranchia.

dermatogen (dér-má'té-jen), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -gen, producing: see -gen.] In bot., the primitive or nascent epidermis; the primordial cellular layer from which the epidermis is developed.

dermatography (dér-má-tog'grá-fí), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -graphia, < graphein, write.] The anatomical description of the skin. Also dermography.

dermatoid (dér-má'toid), a. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -oid, like skin, < deipna(-), skin, + -oid, form.] Resembling skin; skin-like.

dermatological (dér-má-tó-ló-j'i-kál), a. Having to do with dermatology; pertaining or devoted to dermatology.

The case is one to which no precedent has been found after a careful search of dermatological literature.

Allen and Neurol., VIII. 484.

dermatologist (dér-má-tol'ó-jist), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -logia, < logos, speak: see -ology.] One who is versed in dermatology.

dermatology (dér-má-tol'ó-jí), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -logia, < logos, speak: see -ology.] The science of the skin; knowledge concerning the skin and its diseases. Also dermo- dermatolysis (dér-má-tol'i-sis), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -lysis, solution, dissolution, < lyein, loose.] In pathol.: (a) A relaxed and pendulous condition of the skin. (b) Psoriasis.

dermatomycosis (dér-má-tó-mí-kó-sis), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + mycosis, fungus, + -osis, see mycosis.] In pathol., any disease of the skin caused by a vegetable parasite.

dermatonosis (dér-má-ton'ó-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + -nosis, disease.] In pathol., any disease of the skin.

Dermatophili (dér-má-tó-fí-li), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + -philos, loving.] A group of minute parasitic arachnids or folioid mites, corresponding to the family Demodidae.

Dermatophyes (dér-má-tó-fí-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + -phyes, a bellow.] In Owen's system of classification, an order of Arachnida, including the Arctos or water-bears, the Pedecometes, and certain mites, as Demodex, characterized by the absence of distinct respiratory organs. Also Dermophyes.

dermatophyte (dér-má-tó-fít), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -phytes, a growth, plant.] A plant that grows upon the skin; a fungus of a low type which is parasitic upon the skin of men and other animals, causing various diseases. The best-known species are Achorion Schöenleini, the fungus of favus; Trichophyton tonsurans, the fungus of ringworm; and Micropori on furfur.

dermatophytic (dér-má-tó-fít'ik), a. [dermatophyte + -ic.] Of or pertaining to, or caused by, dermatophytes: as, dermatophytic diseases.

Dermatopnea (dér-má-top'né), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + pné, a blowing, < pnéiv, blow, breathe.] A group of gastropodous mollusks with rudimentary gills or none. It consists of such genera as Limacina, Physiculus, and Elysia. Also called Pellibranchia, Abranchia, Succinea, and Agnostus.

Dermatoptera (dér-má-top'té-rá), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dermatopter, < Gr. déma(-), skin, + pteron, a wing. Cf. Dermoptera, dermopterous.] 1. In entom., same as Dermaptera.—2. In mammal., same as Dermoptera.

dermatosclerosis (dér-má-tó-skí-s'ró-sis), n. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + sklerosis, a hardening: see sclerosis.] Same as ectodermia.

dermatosis (dér-má-tó-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + -osis.] 1. The state or condition of having a bony integument, or osseous exoskeleton, as exemplified by a sturgeon, turtle, or armadillo.—2. In pathol., any disease of the skin.

dermatoskeletal (dér-má-tó-ské'l'e-tál), a. [dermatoskeleton + -al.] Same as dermoskeletal.

dermatoskeleton (dér-má-tó-ské'l'e-tón), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1828), < Gr. déma(-), skin, + skelēn, skeleton.] Same as dermoskeleton.

dermatoseria (dér-má-tó-sé-rá'si), n. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + seria, dryness, < seraiv, dry, parch, < seréiv, dry.] In pathol., same as zerodermia.

Dermestes (dér-mes'téz), n. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + (irreg.) estheiv, eat.] A genus of coleopterous insects, the type of the family Dermestidae. The larvae devour dead bodies, skins, leather, and other animal substances. One species, D. lardarius, is known by the name of beetle; another, D. or Anthrenus sinuatus, is particularly destructive in museums of natural history. See cut under beetle.

dermestid (dér-mes'tid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Dermestidae.

II. n. A member of the Dermestidae.

Dermestidae (dér-mes'tí-dé), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Dermestes + -idae.] A family of elavicorn Coleoptera. The dorsal segments of the abdomen are partly membranous; the ventral segments are free; the tarsi are 5-jointed, at least in one pair; the mentum is moderate or small; the palpi are approximate at the base; the anterior coxae are large, conical, and prominent; the posterior coxae are not prominent; the antennae are moderate in length, and capitate; the posterior coxae are setaceous for the thighs; and the body is usually scaly or pubescent.

dermestoid (dér-mes'toid), a. [Dermestes + -oid.] Resembling the genus Dermestes; of or pertaining to the Dermestidae.

dermic (dér'mík), a. [derm or derma + -ic.] 1. In anat., dermal; enderonic; of or pertaining to the dermis: as, the dermic layer of the skin.

When the dermic process is papilliform, and sunk in a pit of the dermis, the conical cap of modified epidermis which coats it is either a hair or a feather.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 40.

2. In med., cutaneous; pertaining to the skin: as, a dermic disease.—Dermic remedies, remedies which act through the skin.

dermis (dér'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. déma, conformed in term. to epidermis.] Same as derma.

Dermobranchia (dér-mó-brang'ki-gá), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + bráxyia, gills.] A group of marine opisthobranchiate gastropodous mollusks. They respire by means of external gills in the form of dorsal membranous layers, tails, or filaments, and there is no mantle or shell in the adult. The common sea-lantern, Doris (which see), is an example. It is an extensive and diversified group, containing all the opisthobranchiate gastropods excepting the Pleurobranchia. It is subdivided into the Abranchia and the Neobranchia or Notobranchia, the largest and typical group, a synonym of Dermobranchia itself, which is also divided into Ceratobranchia, Cladobranchia, and Pygobranchia. Also Dermobranchia, Dermatobranchia, Dermobranchia.

Dermobranchiata (dér-mó-brang'ki-s'té), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dermobranchiate: see dermobranchiate.] Same as Dermobranchia.

dermobranchiate (dér-mó-brang'ki-át), a. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + bráxyia, gills.] Pertaining to the Dermobranchia; nudibranchiate.

Dermochelydidae (dér-mó-ke-lí'dí-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Dermochelys (-chelyd-) + -idae.] A family of soft-shelled turtles, named from the genus Dermochelys: usually called Sphargididae (which see).

Dermochelys (dér-mó-k'e-lis), n. [NL., < Gr. déma(-), skin, + chelys, a tortoise.] The typical genus of Dermochelydidae: same as Sphargis, and of prior date.

dermogastic (dér-mó-gás'trik), a. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + gastri, stomach.] Pertaining to the skin and to the stomach; connecting the alimentary canal with the integument; furnishing communication between the intestinal tube and the exterior of the body: as, a dermogastic pore.

The number of the pore-canals (dermo-gastic pores), which have consequently a dermal and gastric orifice, is generally very great.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 111.

dermography (dér-mog'grá-fí), n. Same as dermatography.

dermoheal, dermahemal (dér-mó, dér-má-hé'mál), a. [Improper forms for dermal, dermoheal, or dermathemal, < Gr. déma(-), skin, + hēma, blood.] Pertaining to the skin on the hemal or ventral aspect of the body: specifically applied to dermoskeletal elements of the median ventral fins of fishes, as the bones supporting the rays of these fins: contrasted with dermoheal. Also spelled dermoheal, dermahemal.

dermoheal, dermoheemia (dér-mó-hé'mí-gá), n. [NL. dermoheemia, improp. for dermoheemia or dermathemia, < Gr. déma(-), skin, + hēma, blood.] In pathol., hyperemia of the skin.

dermoheumeral (dér-mó-hé'mé-rál), a. [NL. dermoheumeral, < Gr. déma(-), skin, + L. humerus, prop. umerus, humerus.] Connecting the humerus with the skin; specifically, pertaining to the dermoheumeral.

dermoheumeralis (dér-mó-hé'mé-rá'lis), n.; pl. dermoheumeralia (-lēs). [NL.: see dermoheumeral.] That part of the panniculus carnosus, or fleshy pannicle, by which the humerus is indirectly attached to the skin: a muscle in many animals, not represented in man.

dermoid (dér'moid), a. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + -oid, form. More accurately dermatoid, q. v.] Same as dermal.—Dermoid cyst, a cystic tumor of congenital origin, found in the ovary, the testicle, the region of the mouth, neck, and orbit, and rarely elsewhere, containing sebaceous matter. Its walls resemble true skin, and may develop hairs and teeth.

dermology (dér-mol'ó-jí), n. Same as dermatology.

dermomuscular (dér-mó-mus'kú-lér), a. [Gr. déma(-), the skin, + L. musculus, muscle.] Pertaining to skin and muscle; consisting of dermal and muscular tissue: as, the dermomuscular tube of a worm.

The suckers found in the Trematoda, Cestoda, and Hirudinea are special differentiations of the dermo-muscular tube.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 143.

dermonural (dér-mó-nú'ral), a. [Gr. déma(-), the skin, + neur, a nerve.] Pertaining to the skin on the neural or dorsal aspect of the body: specifically applied to the dermoskeletal elements of the median dorsal fins of fishes, as the bones supporting the rays of these fins: contrasted with dermoheal. Also dermanural, dermatonural.

dermoscous (dér-mó-só's-us), a. [Gr. déma(-), skin, + L. os (oss-), bone.] Having the character of ossified integument or bony tissue developed in the skin; bony, as the dermal skeleton; exoskeletal.

The gaseous, liquid, and solid molecular conditions, being characters distinguishing otherwise allied substances in the same way morphologically (we can not say yet developmentally), as the cartilaginous, osseous, and exoskeletal or dermoscous characters distinguish otherwise nearly allied genera.

E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 44.

dermoossification (dér-mó-ó'sí-fí-ká'shon), n. [Gr. déma(-), the skin, + E. ossification.] Dermal ossification; formation of bony tissue in the integument as a part of the dermoskeleton, or a bony exoskeletal element: as, "dermoossification of the cranium." E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 48.

dermoossify (dér-mó-ó'sí-fí), v. t.; pret. and pp. dermoossified, ppr. dermoossifying. [Gr. déma(-), the skin, + osify.) To ossify dermally; become dermoosseous; form a dermoossification or a dermoosskeleton. E. D. Cope.

dermo-pathic (dér-mô-path'ik), a. [dermo-pathy + -ic.] Relating or pertaining to dermo-pathy.

dermo-pathy (dér-mô-pá-thi), n. [Gr. déppa, skin, + pathos, suffering.] Surgical treatment of the skin.

Dermophyes (dér-mô-fî's), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Dermatophyes.

Dermoptera (dér-môp'te-râ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dermopterus: see dermopterus.] A suborder of Insectivora, containing the single family Galeosithicidae (which see). Also Dermatoptera, Pterophora.

dermo-ptere (dér-mô-p'te-râ), n. A vertebrate of the group Dermoptera.

Dermopteri (dér-môp'te-ri), n. pl. [NL., pl. of dermopterus: see dermopterus.] In Owen's system of classification, the lowest of five subclasses of the class Pisces, characterized by a vermiform limbless body, a notochordal membrano-cartilaginous endoskeleton, and no skull, or a skull with no lower jaw. It thus covered the acranial, leptocephalic, cylostomous, or pharyngobranchiate vertebrates, as the lancelets, and the monorhine, cyclostomous, or maripendobranchiate vertebrates, as the hags and lampreys. It was divided into two orders, Cyclostomata and Cyclostomata, respectively containing the lancelets and the hags and lampreys. These groups are very distinct from each other, and are now generally regarded as different classes of Vertebrata. Also called Dermopterygii. [Not in use.]

dermo-pterus (dér-môp'te-rus), a. [NL. dermopterus, Gr. dépponteros, having membranous wings, as a bat (Aristotle), déppa, the skin, + pteron, wing.] Having the characters of the Dermopteri.

dermo-pterygia (dér-môp'te-rij'i-an), a. [As Dermopterygia + -an.] Same as dermopterus.

Dermopterygii (dér-môp'te-rij'i-ân), n. pl. [NL., Gr. déppa, skin, + pteron or pteron (pteron), wing, fin, Gr. pteron, wing.] Same as Dermopteri.

Dermorhynchus (dér-mô-ring'k), n. pl. [NL., pl. of dermorhynchus: see dermorhynchus.] The lamellirostral birds; the duck tribe: so called from the soft-skinned bill.

dermorhynchous (dér-mô-ring'kus), a. [NL. dermorhynchus, Gr. déppa, skin, + rhyxos, snout.] Having a skinny bill, as a duck; specifically, pertaining to the Dermorhynchii.

dermosclerite (dér-mô-skli'st), n. [Gr. déppa, skin, + sclerite, hard: see sclerite.] A mass of spicules occurring in the tissues of some of the Achnosoa.

dermoskeletal (dér-mô-akel'e-tal), a. [dermo-skeleton + -al.] Pertaining to the dermo-skeleton; exoskeletal.

dermo-skeleton (dér-mô-akel'e-tôn), n. [NL., Gr. déppa, skin, + anaktôn, skeleton.] The coriaceous, crustaceous, testaceous, or bony integument, such as covers many invertebrate and some vertebrate animals. It serves more or less completely the offices of protecting the soft parts of the body and as a fixed point of attachment to the organs of movement. In fishes and reptiles the dermo-skeleton is the skin with the scales; in turtles it is the shell united with parts of the endoskeleton, such as the vertebrae and ribs; in insects and crustaceans have a dermo-skeleton only. See exoskeleton. Also dermo-skeleton, dermo-skeleton.

dermotomy (dér-mô-tô-mi), n. [Gr. déppa, skin, + tomya, Gr. tomya, cutting: see anatomy.] The anatomy or dissection of the skin.

dermo-skeleton (dér-mô-akel'e-tôn), n. Same as dermo-skeleton.

dern (dérn), a. [Also written derns and dern; ME. derns, dern, derns, durne, AS. durne, rarely dern, secret, = OS. durn = OFries. durn, dren (in comp.) = OHG. durn, hidden, > F. durn, dull, > durn, tarnish, > E. durnish: see tarnish.] Hidden; secret; private.

Piers Plowman (B), ix. 180.

Now with their backs to the den's mouth they sit,
Yet shoulder not all light from the dern pit

Dr. H. More, Immortal of the Soul, i. 10.

Through dreary beds of tangled fern,
Through groves of nightshade dark and dern.

J. R. Drake, Culprit Fay.

In dern, in secret.

My dule in dern hot gif thou dill, Douties bot dreid I dé.

Robins and Malins (Child's Ballads, IV. 266).

dern (dérn), v. [ME. durnen, durnen, AS. durnen = OS. durnen = OHG. durnen, durnen, MHG. durnen, hide; from the adj.] I. trans. To hide; secrete, as in a hole. [Obsolete or prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

He at length escaped them by derning himself in a fox-carth.
H. Miller.

II. intrans. To hide one's self; skulk.
But look how soon they heard of Holotarne
Their courage quail'd, and they began to dern.

F. Hudson, tr. of Du Bartas, in England's Parnassus.

dern (dérn), n. Same as derns.

dern (dérn), v. t. Same as derns, a minced form of dama. Also written derns. [Vulgar, U. S.]

dernful (dérn'fûl), a. [Irreg. < dern + -ful.] Solitary; hence, sad; mournful.

The birds of ill presage this luckless chance foretold
By dernful noise.
L. Bryant (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 268).

dernier (dér-nî-ér or, as F., der-nî-ér), a. [F. dernier, ML. as if "deretrarius" (cf. OF. der-rain, > E. darren, q. v.), < "deretrarius", < L. de, down, + retro, back: see rear, retro.] Last; final; ultimate: now used only as French, as in the phrase dernier ressort, last resort, final resource.

After the dernier proof of him in this manner . . . he was dismissed.
Roger North, Examen, p. 630.

dernly (dérn'li), adv. [Also written dernly; ME. dernly, dernliche, secretly, < derns, secret, + -ly, -liche: see dern, a., and -ly.] 1. Secretly.

Hit waitz the ladi, loflyest to be holde,
That drog the dor after hir ful dernly & styll.
Sir Gasparne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 1188.

2. Solitarily; hence, sadly; mournfully.
They heard a ruefull voice, that dernly cride.
Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 25.

derodontid (dér-ô-don'tid), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Derodontidae.

2. n. One of the Derodontidae.

Derodontidae (dér-ô-don'ti-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Derodontus + -idae.] A family of elavicorn beetles. The dorsal segments of the abdomen are partly membranous; the ventral segments are hard; the tarsi are 5 jointed, at least in one pair, the mentum is moderate or small, the palpi are approximate at base; and the anterior coxae are conical, transverse, and seldom prominent.

Derodontus (dér-ô-don'tus), n. [NL. (Le Conte, 1861), Gr. dêpn, the neck, + dôntos (dôntos) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of the family Derodontidae. They are moderately small beetles, two species of which, D. maculatus and D. trisignatus, are North American.

Once name you derogately, when to sound your name
It not concern'd me.
Shak., A. and C., II. 2.

derogation (dér-ô-gât-shn), n. [= F. déroga-tion = Sp. derogacion = Pg. derogação = It. derogazione, < L. derogatio (-o), a partial abrogation of a law, < derogare, repeal a part of a law, derogate: see derogate, v.] 1. The act of impairing effect in whole or in part; limitation as to extent, or restraint as to operation: as, a statute in derogation of the common law must not be enlarged by construction.

Such a demand may not, in strictness, be in derogation of public law.
Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 430.

2. The act of impairing or seeking to impair merit, reputation, or honor; a lessening of value or estimation; detraction; disparagement.

What dishonor is this to God? Or what derogation is this to heaven?
Lattimer, Sermon of the Plough.

The derogations therefore, which grow to learning from the fortune or condition of learned men, are either in respect of scarcity of means, or in respect of privateness of life.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 25.

He counted it no derogation of his manhood to be seen to weep.
Robertson.

derogative (dér-ô-gât-tiv), a. [< L. as if "derogatus", < L. derogare, derogate: see derogate, v.] Lessening; belittling; derogatory.

It. derogatorio*, < L. derogatorius, < L. derogare: see derogate, v.] 1. a. Detracting or tending to lessen by taking something away; that lessens extent, effect, estimation, etc.: with to, sometimes from.

Derogatory from the wisdom and power of the Author of nature.

Chayne.

His language was severely censured by some of his brother poets as derogatory to their order.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., x.

Derogatory clause in a testament. See clause.—Syn. Deprecative, discreditable, disgraceful.

II. 2. A derogatory act or statement; a disparagement. Cotgrave.

Derophytus (dér-ôp'ti-us), n. [NL. (Wagler), < Gr. dêpn, neck, + pteron, a winnowing-shovel or fan, < ptéron, spew out, cast out, = E. ptora, q. v.] A genus of South American short-tailed parrots, having a large erectile nuchal crest. D. coronatus is the crested hawk-parrot, also called hio.

Derostomidae (dér-ô-stôm'i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Derostomum + -idae.] A family of rhabdoculous turbellarians, having the mouth anterior and a dilated pharynx.

Derostomum (dér-ô-stôm'm), n. [NL., < Gr. dêpn, neck, + stoma, mouth.] The typical ge-South American Hawk-parrot (Derophytus coronatus).

ans of the family Derontomidae. D. schmidt- owens is an example. Also Derontoma.
Derontomata (der-ō-tōm'ā-tā), n. pl. [NL., <
Gr. derōn, neck, + tomē (-tōm), a hole, < τρυπέω (trypēō), bore.] A group of urodele batrachians.
They have no external gill-tufts, but usually gill-slits or branchial apertures. The maxillary and vomerine teeth are in single series. The group is distinguished on the one hand from Boreas, Proteus, and Necturus, and on the other from the salamandrids proper. It consists of the genera Ambystoma, Cryptobranchius, and Hypsiobranchius, and corresponds to the families Cryptobranchiidae and Amb- ystomidae. Also Derontoma.

Other (than perennibranchiate) Urodela are devoid of external gills, but (as is the case in Menopoma and Amph- iuma) present one or two small gill-clefts on each side of the neck, and are thence called Derontomata.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 162.

derontomatous (der-ō-tōm'ā-tūs), a. [< Der- ontomata + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Derontomata.

derotreme (der-ō-trēm), a. and n. [< Gr. derōn, neck, + trēmā, hole.] 1. a. In Amphibia, having holes in the neck in which gills are concealed; cryptobranchiate, as an amphibian; dero- trematous.

II. n. One of the Derontomata.

derriek (der'ik), n. [Formerly sometimes spelled derrie; from Derriek, also written Derick, a hangman employed at Tyburn, London, at the beginning of the 17th century, and often mentioned in contemporary plays: e. g.,

The theefe that dyes at Tyburne . . . is not halfe so dangerous . . . as the Polliticke Bankrupt. I would there were a Derick to hang him up too.

Dekker, Seven Deadly Sins (ed. Arber), p. 17.

He rides circuit with the devil, and Derriek must be his host, and Tyburne the inn at which he will light.

The Bellman of London (1616).

The name was applied to a gallows, and then to a sort of crane. The name Derriek is < D.
Derriek, contr. Dirk, earlier Diederik, also (after G.) Dietrick = OHG. Dietrich, MHG. G.
Dietrich = AS. Theddric = Goth. **Thudareiks* (Latinized Theodoricus, Theodericus), lit. chief of the people, < thiuda (= AS. thōd, etc.), people, + reiks = AS. rice, chief, mighty, rich;
see Dutch and rich. The same term -rick appears in the proper name Frederick, and disguised in Henry.] An apparatus for lifting and moving heavy weights. It is similar to the crane, but differs from it in having the boom, which corresponds to the jib of the crane, pivoted at the lower end so that it may take different inclinations from the perpendicular. The weight is suspended from the end of the boom by ropes or chains that pass through a block at the end of the boom and thence directly to the crab, a winding-apparatus or motor at the foot of the post. Another rope connects the top of the boom with a block at the top of the post, and thence passes to the motor below. The motions of the derriek are a direct lift, a circular motion round the axis of the post, and a radial motion within the circle described by the point of the boom.
On shipboard a derriek is a spar raised on end, with the head steadied by guys and the heel by lashings, and having one or more purchases depending from it to raise heavy weights. - Floating derriek, a movable derriek erected on a special boat or vessel. Such derrieks have a single central post or support, and a horizontal boom supported at some elevation on the post and carrying a travelling carriage which bears the block from which the lead is suspended. The boom is supported by stays from the top of the post, and is also counterbalanced by means of stays run from the opposite end of the boom to the deck of the vessel on which the derriek is built. The floating derriek used by the Department of Docks in New York has a lifting capacity of 100 tons, and a clear lift of 50 feet.

derriek-car (der'ik-kār), n. A railroad-car upon which a small derriek is mounted, used especially for clearing the line of wrecks or other obstructions.

derriek-crane (der'ik-kran), n. A crane in which the post is supported by fixed stays in the rear and the jib is pivoted like the boom of a derriek. It has the radial motion of a derriek without its freedom of circular motion. The travel of the lead behind is limited by the fixed stays.

derries (der'in),
n. pl. [Prob. a
var. of dawries, the Indian fabrics known in the West by that name.] A cotton cloth, usually of blue and brown, or of either of these colors, with white, made in very simple designs, such as stripes.

derriing-doe, n. See daring-do.

derriing-doe, n. See daring-door.

derriinger (der'in-jer), n. [After the inventor, an American gunsmith.] A short-barreled pistol of large caliber, very efficient at short range.
derri (der'i). [Repr. Ir. doire, an oak-wood, < daír (gen. darach), dair (gen. daro), an oak,
= W. dar and dore, an oak, = Gr. ōvōs, an oak, orig. tree, = Goth. triu = AS. treow, E. tree, q.
v.] A frequent element in Irish place-names:
as, Derry, Derrybrian, Londonberry.

The ancient name of Londonberry was Derry-calgagh, the oak-wood of Calgagh. After St. Columba erected his monastery there, in 546, it was called Derry-Columkille, until James I. granted it to a company of London merchants, who named it Londonberry.

Scottsman (newspaper).

derriy, derri-downy. A meaningless refrain or chorus in old songs.

derthi, n. An obsolete form of dearth.

dertra, n. Plural of dertrum.

dertron (der'tron), n. Same as dertrum.

derthrothea (der-trō-thē'kā), n. [NL., < Gr.
dertron, a vulture's beak (see dertrum), + thēa, a sheath.] In ornith., the integument of the dertrum, however distinguished from the rest of the covering of the beak. It is quite distinct in some birds, as petrels.

dertrum (der'trum), n.; pl. dertra (-trā). [NL., also dertron, < Gr. dertron, the caul or membrane enveloping the bowels (L. omentum), also later used of a vulture's beak, < dipen, skin, flay, = E. tear, q. v.] In ornith., the extremity of the upper mandible of a bird, in any way distinguished from the rest of the bill, as by the hook in a bird of prey or a petrel, the hard part in a pigeon, or the nail in a duck.

derwish (der'vish), n. [Also formerly derwis, derwiss, derwiche, darwiss, etc.; = F. der- viche, derwis = Sp. Pg. derwiche = It. derwis = G. derwisch, < Turk. derwish, Ar. darwish, < Pers.
darwish or darwish, a derwish, so called from his profession of extreme poverty, lit. poor, indigent, being equiv. to Ar. fakir, a fakir, lit.
poor, indigent; see fakir.] A Mohammedan monk, professing poverty, humility, and chastity; a Mohammedan fakir. There are thirty-six orders of regular derwishes, who for the most part observe celibacy, and live in convents of not more than forty persons, under the supervision of a sheik or elder. Some, however, are permitted to marry and live with their families, but are required to spend at least two nights of each week in the monastery. The novitiate is severe, and the rules of the orders are strict. They are generally divided into two classes, viz.: spinning or whirling derwishes (Mes- teries) and hunting derwishes (Suflais). To the violent circular dances and prouetting of the spinning derwishes the latter add vociferous shouting and cries to Allah. The most important order of derwishes is that of the Mevlevia, whose monasteries (Turkish tekke) are found at Konia in Asia Minor, at Constantinople, and elsewhere.

And many of these Derwishes were maintained, to look to his Sepulchre, and to receive the offerings of such as came.

Purtoles, Pilgrimage, p. 308.

A small Gothic chapel . . . is now converted into a mosque, belonging to a Mahometan convent, in which there is only one derwish.

Pouché, Description of the East, II. i. 23.

There were derwishes with beards stained of a fiery-red color, and wearing queer conical hats, who, if they did not regularly belong to the howling sect of Constantinople, most decidedly showed themselves qualified for admission to it by the fashion in which they yelled, screamed, and groaned, exalting me in the name of the blessed Ali, and the Imams Hassan and Hussein, not forgetting Hussein Abas, and many other holy people, to give them charity.

Byron, Parisina, st. 20.

descendable (dē-sen'dg-bl), a. [OF. descendable, < descendre, descend: see descend and -able.] Same as descendible.

descendant (dē-sen'dant), a. and n. [OF. descendant, F. descendant = Sp. descendiente, descendente = Pg. descendente = It. descendente, discendente = D. G. Dan. Sw. descendant, < L. descendant (-t-), ppr. of descendere, descend: see descend, descendent. The adj., not common in either spelling, is usually spelled descendent, after the L.; but the noun is nearly always descendant, etc.] I. a. See descendent.

II. n. 1. An individual proceeding from an ancestor in any degree; issue; offspring, near or remote.

It happeneth sometimes that the grandchild, or other descendant, resembleth the ancestor more than the son.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 19.

As we would have our descendants judge us, so ought we to judge our fathers.

Mausley, Sir J. Mackintosh.

Are not improved steam engines or clocks the lineal descendants of some existing steam engine or clock? Is there ever a new creation in art or science any more than in nature?

A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select, p. 226.

Before a cocoa-nut tree has ripened its first cluster of nuts, the descendants of a wheat plant, supposing them all to survive and multiply, will have become numerous enough to occupy the whole surface of the earth.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 299.

2. In astron., the descending or western horizon or cusp of the seventh house. — Syn. 1. See spring.

descendent (dē-sen'dent), a. and n. [The same as descendant, conformed in spelling to the orig. L. descendant (-t-), ppr. of descendere, descend: see descend, descendant.] I. a. 1. Going or coming down; falling; sinking; descending.

There is a regress of the sap in plants from above downwards, and this descendent juice is that which principally nourishes both fruit and plant.

Ray, Works of Creation.

2. In her., flying downward and showing the back: said of a bird used as a bearing. — 3. Proceeding or descending from an original, as an ancestor.

More than mortal grace Speaks thee descendant of ethereal race

Pope

Descendant displayed, in her., flying downward with the wings displayed or opened widely.

II. n. See descendant.

descendentalism (dē-sen-den'tal-izm), n. [OF. descendant + -al + -ism, after transcendentalism.] A disposition or tendency to depreciate or lower; depreciation.

With all this Descendentalism, he combines a Transcendentalism no less superlative; whereby if on the one hand he degrades man below most animals, except those jacketed Gouda cows, he on the other exalts him beyond the visible heavens, almost to an equality with the gods.

Coryat, Sartor Resartus, I. 10.

descendentalist (dē-sen-den'tal-ist), n. [OF. descendant + -al + -ist.] One given to descendentalism; a depreciator: as, "a respectable descendentalist," Harper's Mag., LXV. 579.

descender (dē-sen'der), n. 1. One who descends. — 2. That which descends, as a descending letter (which see, under descending).

descendibility (dē-sen-di-bil'i-ti), n. [OF. descendible: see -bility.] The quality of being descendible, or capable of being transmitted from ancestors: as, the descendibility of an estate or of a crown.

descendible (dē-sen'di-bl), a. [OF. descend + -ible.] 1. Capable of being descended with safety or comparative ease; that permits of a safe downward passage: as, a descendible hill.

— 2. That can descend from an ancestor to a descendant; capable of being transmitted, as from father to son: as, a descendible estate.

There are some who . . . [assert that] the Benefices, which at first were held for life, became at last descendible from father to son.

Maine, Village Communities, p. 122.

Also spelled descendable.

descending (dē-sen'ding), p. a. [Ppr. of descend, v.] 1. Moving or directed downward; characterized by downward direction.

He clapt his head with one descending blow.

Dryden.

Specifically—(a) In bot., turned downward: as, a descending ovule; the descending axis of a plant, the root, in distinction from the stem or ascending axis. (b) In entom., sloping steeply from the surface behind; directed obliquely downward or toward the ventral surface of the body: as, the rostrum of a weevil with descending scrobes. (c) In her., having the head turned toward the base of the shield: said of an animal used as a bearing.

2. Characterized by descent or decrease as regards the value or importance of its constituent members; indicating a continued lowering as regards position, value, or importance: as, a descending scale or series.—Descending axis. See axis, 8.—Descending letters, in type-founding, letters with a long stem that descends below the line, as g, p, q, z.—Descending node, the point at which a planet passes from the north to the south side of the ecliptic or of the equator.—Descending rhythm, in pros., a rhythm composed of feet in which the metrically unaccented part, commonly known as the thesis, follows the metrically accented part, commonly known as the arsis, so called because the voice is regarded as rising on the first and falling on the second part of each foot. According to the ancient mode of pronunciation, however, the first part of such feet took the stress, and the second not, regardless of pitch. The trochee (— —), dactyl (— — —), Ionic a major (— — — —), first pæon (— — — —), and antibacchus (— — — —) form cola or verses with descending rhythm, in contrast with the iambus (— — —), anapest (— — — —), Ionic a minor (— — — —), fourth pæon (— — — —), and Bacchus (— — — —), which form series or lines with ascending rhythm.

—Descending series, in math., a series in which each term is numerically less than that preceding it; also, an infinite series in descending powers of the variable—that is, a series of the form  $a + bx^{-1} + cx^{-2} + \dots$ , etc.

descenset (dē-sens'), n. [OF. descenset, descenset, f., descenset, m., = Sp. Pg. descenset, < L. descenset, a going down, descent, < descendere, pp. descensus, descend: see descend.] Descent.

A Rejoinder to Doctor Hill concerning the Descenset of Christ into Hell By Alexander Hume, Master of Artes

A. Hume, Orthographie (E. K. T. S.), Pref., ix.

descension (dē-sen'shon), n. [Formerly also descension; < ME. descension, < OF. descension, descens = Fr. descension = Sp. descension = Pg. descensio = It. descensione, < L. descensio (-n-), < descendere, pp. descensus, descend: see descend.]

1. The act of going down or downward; descent, either literal or figurative.

In Christ's descension, we are to consider both the place from which it did commence, and the place to which it did proceed.

South, Works, VII. i.

2. A falling or precipitation; fall; declension.

Whatever is dishonourable hath a base descension, and sinks beneath hell.

Middleton, Sir R. Sherley Sent Ambassador.

3†. In old chem., the deposition or precipitation of the essential juice dissolved from the distilled matter. See distillation by descent, under decent. — 4. In old astron., negative ascension, the angular amount by which the projection of a star from the pole upon the equinoctial is below some horizon. If this horizon passes through the poles and equinoctial points, the angle is called right descension; if the horizon passes through the equinoctial points but not through the poles, the angle is called oblique descension.

The lord of the ascendant say they that he is fortunate, when he is in god place, . . . and that he be not retrograd, . . . ne that he be not in his descension, nor loigned with no planets in his descension.

Chaucer.

descensional (dē-sen'shon-al), a. [OF. descension + -al.] Of or pertaining to descension or descent.—Descensional difference, in old astron., the difference between the right and the oblique descension of the same star or point of the heavens.

descensive (dē-sen'siv), a. [*ML. *descensivus* (adv. descensive), < L. descensus, pp. of descendere, descend: see descend.] Descending; tending downward; having power to descend.

descensory, n. [ME. = OF. descensoire, descensoir, < *ML. *descensorium*, prop. neut. of L. descensorius, descending, < L. descensus, pp. of descendere, descend: see descend.] A vessel used in old chemistry in which distillation by descent was performed. Chaucer.

descent (dē-sent'), n. [ME. descent, < OF. descensio, f., AP. also descent, m., F. descensio, descent, < descendere, descend: see descend. Cf. ascend, ascend.] 1. The act of descending; the act of passing from a higher to a lower place by any form of motion.

The descent of the mountain I found more wearisome . . . than the ascent.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 92.

2. A downward slope or inclination; a declivity.

I see no danger yet; for the descent, methinks, is thus far green, even, and easy.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 221.

Taught by the heavenly Muse to venture down
The dark descent, and up to reascend.

Milton, P. L., iii. 20.

3. A fall or decline from a higher to a lower state or station; declension; degradation.

O foul descent! that I, who erst contended
With gods to sit the highest, am now constrain'd Into a beast.

Milton, P. L., ix. 162.

4. A sudden or hostile coming down upon a person, thing, or place; an incursion; an invasion; a sudden attack.

They feared that the French and English fleets would make a descent upon their coasts.

Jortin, Remarks on Eccles. Hist.

Ferdinand, who had already completed his preparations in Sicily, made a descent on the southern extremity of Calabria.

Picciotto, Ferd and Is., ii. 2.

In 1778 he [Paul Jones] made a descent upon Whitehaven, in Scotland, set fire to the shipping, [and] took two forts.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

5. In law, the passing of real property to the heir or heirs of one who dies without disposing of it by will; transmission by succession or inheritance; the hereditary devolution of real property either to a single heir at law (common in England) or to the nearest relatives in the same degree, whether in a descending, ascending, or collateral line. See heir.

Jefferson . . . had taken care for the equal descent of real estate, as well as other property, to children of both sexes.

Baronry, Hist. Const., I. 112.

6. Genealogical extraction from an original or progenitor; lineage; pedigree; specifically, in biol., evolution; derivation: said of species, etc., as well as of individuals.

Trust me, Clara Vere de Vere,
From yon blue heavens above us bent
The gardener Adam and his wife Smile at the claims of long descent.

Tennyson, Lady Clara Vere de Vere.

The researches of Professor Marsh into the paleontology of the horse have established beyond question the descent of the genus Equus from a five-toed mammal not larger than a pig, and somewhat resembling a tapir.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 266.

7†. A generation; a single degree in the scale of genealogy, traced from the common ancestor.

No man living is a thousand descents removed from Adam himself.

Hooper, Eccles. Polity.

From son to son, some four or five descents.

Shak., All's Well, iii. 7.

8†. Offspring; issue; descendants collectively.

If care of our descent perplex us most,
Which must be born to certain woe.

Milton, P. L., x. 979.

9†. A rank; a step or degree.

Infinite descents
Beneath what other creatures are to thee.

Milton, P. L., viii. 419.

There were about forty-three degrees of seats, and eleven descents down from the top [of the theater], which are two feet wide, and the uppermost are about fifty-five feet apart; these descents are made by dividing each seat into two steps.

Poets, Description of the Seat, II. ii. 72.

10†. The lowest place.

From the extremest upward of thy head,
To the descent and dust beneath thy feet.

Shak., Lear, v. 2.

11. pl. In fort., a hole, vault, or hollow place made by undermining the ground.—12. In music, a passing from a higher to a lower pitch.

—13. In logic, an inference from a proposition containing a higher term to a proposition containing a lower term. This is also called ergistic descent, in opposition to stigmatic descent, which is a proposition dividing a genus into its species.—Angle of de-

As Eagle Descend.

descent. See angle.—Collateral descent, descent from a collateral relative, as from brother or sister, uncle or aunt.—Descent cast, in law, the devolution of an estate in land upon the heir at the death of the ancestor or possessor; descent which has apparently taken effect. The special significance of the term, as contrasted with descent, is in its use to designate the devolution of an estate of inheritance claimed by the heirs of a wrongful possessor. While the wrongful possessor lived, the rightful owner could enter against him. After his death, the right of entry was said to be tolled, or taken away, because not allowable after descent cast.—Descent of bodies, in mech., their motion or tendency toward the center of the earth, either directly or obliquely along inclined planes or curves. The curve of swiftest descent is the cycloid.—Descent of souls, the supposed entrance of preexistent souls into their bodies.—Descents into the ditch, cuts and excavations made by means of saps in the counterparty beneath the covered way. Wilhelm, Mil. Dict.—Distillation by descent, in old chem., a mode of distillation in which the fire was applied at the top and around the vessel, whose orifice was at the bottom, by which means the vapors were made to distil downward.—Descent, in her., in the act or attitude of descending: thus, lion in descent is one represented with the hind legs in one corner of the chief, and the head and fore paws in the diagonally opposite corner of the base.—Lineal descent, descent from father to son, through successive generations.—Syn. 2. Gradient, grade.—3. Debatement.—4. Foray, raid.—5. Generation, parentage, derivation.

desclorite (dè-clô'rit), n. [After A. L. O. Des Cloizeaux, a French mineralogist (born 1817).] A rare vanadate of lead and zinc, occurring in small black or dark-brown crystals. It is related in form and composition to the copper phosphate lithemite, and is found in the Argentine Republic, and in various localities in Arizona and New Mexico.

describable (des-kri'bə-bl), a. [describe + -able.] That may be described; capable of description.

Krith has reckoned up in the human body four hundred and forty-six muscles, disectible and describable.

Paley, Nat. Theol., ix.

describe (des-krib'), v.; pret. and pp. described, ppr. describing. [Earlier descrie (the form descrie being a reversion to the L. form), < ME. describen, desoreven (see descrie), < OF. descriere, contr. descrire, F. décrire = Pr. descriure = Sp. describir = Pg. descrever = It. descrivere, < L. describere, copy off, transcribe, sketch off, describe in painting or writing; < de, off, + scribere, write: see scribe and shrive.] I. trans. 1. To delineate or mark the form or figure of; trace out; outline: as, to describe a circle with the compasses.

He that would have a sight of these things, let him resort to Thomasas Porcacchi his Funerall Antichell, where these things are not only discouered in words, but described in artificiall pictures. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 303.

2. To form or trace by motion: as, a star describes an ellipse in the heavens.

The bucket, which was a substitute for the earth, describing a circular orbit round about the globular head and ruby visage of Professor Von Poddingsfoot, which formed no bad representation of the sun.

Irvine, Knickerbocker, p. 39.

3t. To write down; inscribe.

His name was described in the book of life.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 302.

4. To represent orally or by writing; portray in words; give an account of: as, to describe a person or a scene; to describe a battle.

Similes are like songs in love:
They much describe; they nothing prove.

Prior, Alma, III.

There are no books which I more delight in than in travels, especially those that describe remote countries.

Addison, Frozen Words.

5t. To distribute into classes or divisions; divide for representation.

The men went and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book.

Josh. xviii. 9.

—Syn. 4. Describe, Narrate, portray, explain. Describe applies primarily to what exists — space, and by extension to what occurs — time, but narrate applies only to the latter: as, to describe a view, a race, or a siege; to narrate an experience or a history. Describe implies often the vividness of personal observation; narrate is more applicable to long series of events. A single narrative may contain many descriptions of separate events.

He is described as a mighty warrior, wielding preternatural powers.

N. A. Rev., CXL 332.

Illustrating the events which they narrated by the philosophy of a more enlightened age.

Macaulay, History.

II. intrans. To make descriptions; use the power of describing.

describer (des-kri'bər), n. [L. describen (-t-), ppr. of describere, describe: see describe.] In geom., the line or surface from the motion of which a surface or a solid is supposed to be generated or described.

describer (des-kri'bər), n. One who describes or depicts by words or signs.

Seven of these stones [of the burnt pillar] now remain, though an exact describer of Constantinople says there were eight. Peacock, Description of the East, II. II. 181.

Our chronicler [the author of [the book of Genesis] does not profess to be a sociologist, but only an observer and describer of a passing scene.

Boardman, Creative Week, p. 187.

descrier (des-kri'ər), n. [descrier + -er.] One who discovers or comes in sight of; a discoverer; a detector.

Streams closely sliding, erring in and out,

But seeming pleasant to the fond descrier.

Quarles, Emblems, iv. 2.

description (des-krip'shən), n. [< ME. description, descriptious, < OF. description, descriptio, < F. description, < Sp. descripción = Pg. descripção = It. descrizione, < L. descriptio (-n-), a marking out, delineation, copy, transcript, representation, description, < describere, pp. descriptus, describe: see describe.] 1. The act of delineating or depicting; representation by visible lines, marks, colors, etc.

The description is either of the earth and water both together, and it is done by circles, or of the water considered by itself; and it is not so much a description of that, as of the mariner's course upon it, or to show the way of a ship upon the sea.

J. Gregory, Posthuma, p. 257.

2. The act of representing a thing by words or signs, or the account or writing containing such representation; a statement designed to make known the appearance, nature, attributes, accidents, or incidents of anything: as, a description of a house or of a battle.

The seventh species of imperfect definition consists of a conservation or heaping up of circumstances and common adjuncts. And this is properly a description; although use has now obtained that every imperfect definition be called a description. For example: Man is a two-footed animal uncovered with hair or feathers, of an erect countenance, and endowed with hands: which formula of definition is used by historians and poets in the description of persons, facts, places, and the like singular things.

Burgesdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

The poet makes a most excellent description of it.

Shak., Hen. V., III. 6.

For her own person,

It beggar'd all description. Shak., A. and C., II. 2.

Milton has fine descriptions of morning. D. Webster.

Firdusi's . . . great work abounds throughout in bold and animated descriptions, and in certain portions rises to the highest sublimity.

N. A. Rev., CXL 332.

3. The qualities expressed in a representation; the combination of qualities which go to constitute a class or an individual, and would be mentioned in describing it; hence, a variety; sort; kind.

Double six thousand, and treble that,

Before a friend of this description

Shall lose a hair through Bassanio's fault.

Shak., M. of V., III. 2.

The plates were all of the meanest description.

Macaulay.

He had received from Shelley, as a token of remembrance, the manuscript of three tales. . . "They were of a very wild and romantic description," he adds, "but full of energy."

E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 94.

The entertainment is said by the press throughout the country to be of the most interesting description.

Washington Chronicle.

Organic description of curves. See curve.—Syn. 2. Relation, Narrative, etc. (see account), delineation, portrayal, sketch.—3. Sort, cast, quality.

descriptive (des-krip'tiv), a. [< F. descriptif = Sp. Pg. descriptivo = It. descrittivo, < L.L. descriptivus, < L. descriptus, pp. of describere, describe: see describe.] Containing description; serving or aiming to describe; having the quality of representing. as, a descriptive diagram; a descriptive narration.

Descriptive names of honour, . . . arising during early militancy, become in some cases official names.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 400.

Descriptive anatomy, anthropology, astronomy. See the nouns.—Descriptive book (midic), a record-book of a military company, containing descriptive lists of its men, also generally a record of the officers who have served with it.—Descriptive botany. See botany.—Descriptive definition, in logic. See definition.—Descriptive geography, geology, etc. See the nouns.—Descriptive list. (1) Narrative, a report or return made out when men in the United States naval service are discharged, or transferred from one ship to another. In it are noted the previous service and a personal description of each man. (2) Midic, a short military history of each enlisted man, with a description of his person, and an abstract of his account with the government. (U. S.).—Descriptive muster-roll. See muster-roll.—Descriptive (opposed to metrical) property or proposition, in geom., usually defined to be a property or proposition which can be stated without introducing the idea of magnitude. But it would be better to say that it is a property or proposition which relates to the incidences or coincidences of points, lines, and other geometrical elements, in general, or that it is one which does not depend upon the particular system of measurement adopted. Thus, the proposition that two triangles are equal if a side and two angles of the one are equal to the corresponding side and angles of the other, may be regarded as descriptive; while the proposition that through any point in space a single parallel to a given line can be drawn, is indisputably metrical, not descriptive.

We have in the plane a special line, the line infinity; and on this line two special (imaginary) points, the circular points at infinity. A geometrical theorem has either no relation to the special line and points, and it is then descriptive; or it has a relation to them, and it is then metrical.

Salmon.

descriptively (des-krip'tiv-ly), adv. By description; so as to delineate or represent.

descriptiveness (des-krip'tiv-ness), n. The character or quality of being descriptive.

descrie (des-kri'), v. t.; pret. and pp. described, ppr. describing. [< ME. descreiven, descreven, < OF. descriere, < L. describere, describe: see describe, which has taken the place in E. of the older descrie.] To describe. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]

Theane cam Conetysse, Ich can nat hym *descrie*se,

So hungerliche and so holwe.

Piers Plowman (C), vii. 193.

How shall fraile pen descrie his heavenly face?

Spenser, F. Q., II. III. 23.

Let me fair nature's face descrie.

Burns, To William Simpson.

descry (des-kri'), v. t.; pret. and pp. described, ppr. describing. [< ME. descryen, descryen, < OF. descrier, descryer, proclaim, announce, cry, < des, de-, + crier, cry: see cry, and cf. decry. The word seems to have been partly confused in ME. with descrie, q. v.] 1t. To proclaim; announce; make known.

Harowdes [heralds] of armes than they went

For to descrye thyrs tournament

In eche lordys gende.

Sir Eglamour, l. 1177.

And seems we on this wise

Shall his counsaile descie,

Itt nedis we vs avise,

That we saye not secretly.

York Plays, p. 403.

He would to him descrie

Great treason to him meant.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. vii. 12.

His Purple Robe he had thrown aside, lest it should descrie him, unwilling to be found. Milton, Hist. Eng., II.

2. To detect; find out; discover (anything concealed).

Of the king they got a sight after dinner in a gallery,

And of the queen-mother at her own table; in neither place descried, no, not by Cadinet, who had been lately ambassador in England.

Sir H. Wotton.

When she saw herself descried, she wept.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 447.

3t. To spy out; explore; examine by observation.

The house of Joseph sent to descrie Beth-el.

Judges I. 22.

It is the soul that sees; the outward eyes

Present the object, but the mind descries.

Crabbe, Works, IV. 211.

4. To discover by vision; get a sight of; make out by looking: as, the lookout descried land.

I descry

Figures of men that crouch and creep unheard,

And bear away the dead. Bryant, The Fountain.

But, on the horizon's verge descried,

Hangs, touch'd with light, one snowy sail!

M. Arnold, Stanzas composed at Carnaa.

Cannot memory still descrie the old school-house and its porch, somewhat hacked by Jack-knives, where you spun tops and snapped marbles?

Emerson, Works and Days.

There are Albanian or Dalmatian heights from which it is said that, in unusually favourable weather, the Garganian peninsula may be descried.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 316.

descry (des-kri'), n. [< descry, v.] Discovery; something discovered. [Rare.]

Edg. But by your favour,

How near's the other army?

Gent. Near, and on speedy foot; the main descry

Stands on the hourly thought.

Shak., Lear, IV. 6.

desecrate (des'è-kràt), v. t.; pret. and pp. desecrated, ppr. desecrating. [*< L. as if *desecratus*, pp. of **desecrare* (> It. disancrare, disancrare = OF. F. desaccrer), desecrate, < de, priv. + sacrare, make sacred, < sacer, sacred: see sacred; formed as the opposite of consecrate. There is a rare L.L. desecrare, desaccrare, with the positive sense 'consecrate,' < L. de-intensive + sacrare, make sacred.]] To divest of sacred or hallowed character or office; divert from a sacred purpose or appropriation; treat with sacrilege; profane; pollute.

The Russian clergy cannot suffer corporal punishment without being previously desecrated.

Troels.

Why should we desecrate noble and beautiful souls by intruding on them?

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 132.

There is a great friars' church on this side too, the desecrated church of Saint Francis.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 16.

As for the material universe, that has long been almost completely desecrated, so that sympathy, communion with the forms of Nature, is pretty well confined to poets, and is generally supposed to be an amiable madness in them.

J. H. Seelye, Nat. Religion, p. 48.

desecrator (des'-krā-tēr), n. One who desecrates. Also desecrator.

Main, the desecrator of the forest temple.

Harper's Mag., LXV. 74.

desecration (des'-krā-shn), n. [desecrate: see -ation.] The act of diverting from a hallowed purpose or use; deprivation of a sacred character or office; sacrilegious or profane treatment or use.

Various profanations of the Sabbath have of late years been evidently gaining ground among us so as to threaten a gradual desecration of that holy day.

Ep. Porteus, Profanation of the Lord's Day.

=Syn. Sacrilege, etc. See profanation.

desecrator (des'-krā-tēr), n. Same as desecrator.

The tide of emotion [in Burke's breast] . . . filled to the brim the cup of prophetic anger against the desecrators of the church and the monarchy of France.

J. Morley, Burke, p. 129.

desegmentation (dē-seg-men-tā-shn), n. [de-priv. + segment + -ation.] The process or result of uniting several segments of the body in one; the confluence of several originally distinct metameric segments into one composite segment; the state or quality of not being segmented. Thus, the thorax of an insect, or the carapace of a lobster, or the cranium of a vertebrate, is a desegmentation of several segments.

A number of metameres may be united to form larger segments in which the separate metameres lose their individuality. . . . This state of things results in a desegmentation of the body.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 228.

desegmented (dē-seg-men-ted), a. [de-priv. + segment + -ed.] Exhibiting or characterized by desegmentation; coalesced, as two or more segments in one; reduced in number of segments, as the body or some part of the body.

desert<sup>1</sup> (dē-zért'), v. [OF. desertor, F. désertor = Pr. Sp. Pg. desertar = It. disertare, desertare = D. deserticon = G. disertiren = Dan. disertere = Sw. desertera, < ML. disertare, desert (also lay waste), freq. of L. deservere, pp. desertus, desert, abandon, forsake, lit. undo one's connection with, < de-priv. + servare, join, bind: see serve.] I. trans. 1. To abandon, either in a good or a bad sense; forsake; hence, to cast off or prove recreant to: as, to desert a falling house; a deserted village; to desert a friend or a cause.

Deserted at his utmost need

By those his former bounty fed.

Dryden, Alexander's Feast, l. 80.

On one occasion he (Cervantes) attempted to escape by land to Oran, a Spanish settlement on the coast, but was deserted by his guide and compelled to return.

Sumner, Orations, l. 238.

Amidst an ancient cypress wood,

A long-deserted ruined castle stood

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, l. 234.

2. To leave without permission; forsake; escape from, as the service in which one is engaged, in violation of duty: as, to desert an army; to desert one's colors; to desert a ship.

Not one common soldier or common sailor is known to have deserted his flag.

Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 148.

To desert the diet, in Scotts criminal law, to abandon proceedings in the particular libel in virtue of which a panel has been brought into court. =Syn. Desert, abandon, etc. (see forsake); to quit, vacate, depart from, run away from. See list under abandon.

II. intrans. To quit a service or post without permission; run away: as, to desert from the army.

The poor fellow had deserted, and was now afraid of being overtaken and carried back.

Goldsmith, Essays.

Must I shoot a simple-minded soldier boy who deserts, while I must not touch a hair of a wily agitator who induces him to desert?

Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 269.

desert<sup>2</sup> (dē-zért'), a. and n. [Earlier often desart; < ME. desert, deserte, desert, desart, deserd, deserd (only as noun), < OF. desert, desert, desert, F. désert, desert (as a noun, OF. desert, F. désert, m. OF. deserte, f. a desert), = Pr. desert = Sp. deserto = Pg. deserto = It. deserto, deserto, < L. desertus, deserted, solitary, waste (neut. desertum, pl. deserta, a desert), pp. of deservere, desert, abandon, forsake: see desert<sup>1</sup>, v.] I. a. 1. Deserted; uncultivated; waste; barren; uninhabited.

He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness.

Deut. xxxii. 10.

Stray all ye Flocks, and desert be ye Plains.

Congress, Death of Queen Mary.

Amidst thy desert walks the lawping flea.

Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 48.

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,

And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

Gray, Elegy.

2. Pertaining to or belonging to a desert; inhabiting a desert: as, the desert folk. — Desert lands, in the land law of the United States, lands which in their existing condition are unfit for cultivation, and are sold on easy terms on condition of being made cultivable within a certain period.

II. n. A desert place or region; a waste; a wilderness; specifically, in geom., a region of considerable extent which is almost if not quite destitute of vegetation, and hence uninhabited, chiefly on account of an insufficient supply of rain: as, the desert of Sahara; the Great American Desert. The presence of large quantities of movable sand on the surface adds to the desert character of a region. The word is chiefly and almost exclusively used with reference to certain regions in Arabia and northern Africa and others lying in central Asia. (See steppe.) The only region in North America to which the word is applied is the Great American Desert, a tract of country south and west of Great Salt Lake, once occupied by the waters of that lake when they extended over a much larger area than they now occupy. The name Great American Desert was originally given to the unexplored region lying beyond the Mississippi, without any special designation of its limits. Colonel Dodge, U. S. A., says in "The Plains of the Great West" (1877): "When I was a schoolboy my map of the United States showed between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains a long and broad white blotch, upon which was printed in small capitals 'The Great American Desert — Unexplored.' . . . What was then regarded as a desert support, in some portions, thriving populations." In Fremont's report the Great Basin is frequently spoken of as "the Desert." It is also called the Great Desert Basin.

Than the seven the Pilgrimes of here Vitaille, for to passe with the Desertes, toward Surrye [Syria].

Mandeville, Travels, p. 68.

One simile that solitary shines

In the dry desert of a thousand lines.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. l. 111.

Oh! that the desert were my dwelling-place,

With one fair spirit for my minister.

Byron, Child Harold, iv. 177.

=Syn. Wilderness, Desert. Strictly, a wilderness is a wild, unclaimed region, uninhabited and uncultivated, while a desert is largely uncultivable and uninhabitable owing to lack of moisture. A wilderness may be full of luxuriant vegetation. In a great majority of the places where desert occurs in the authorized version of the Bible, the revised version changes it to wilderness.

A pathless wilderness remains

Yet unsubdued by man's reclaiming hand.

Shelley, Queen Mab, ix.

Look to America. Two centuries ago it was a wilderness of buffaloes and wolves.

Macaulay, Speech, 1846.

A patch of sand is unpleasant: a desert has all the awe of ocean.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 318.

desert<sup>2</sup> (dē-zért'), n. [ME. deserto, desert, desert, < OF. deserte, deserte, merit, recompense, < deservir, deservir, deserve: see deserve.] 1. A deserving; that which makes one deserving of reward or punishment; merit or demerit; good conferred, or evil inflicted, which merits an equivalent return: as, to reward or punish men according to their deserts. (When used absolutely, without contrary indication, the word always has a good sense.)

A rare Example, where Desert in the Subject, and Reward in the Prince, strive which should be the greater.

Baker, Chronicle, p. 124.

In squandering wealth was his peculiar art:

Nothing went unrewarded but desert.

Dryden, Abs. and Achit., l. 800.

By what accident it matters not, nor upon what desert, but just then . . . I had obtained a very considerable degree of public confidence.

Burke, To a Noble Lord.

Material good has its tax, and if it came without desert or sweat, it has no root in me, and the next wind will blow it away.

Emerson, Compensation.

2. That which is deserved; reward or penalty merited.

God of his grace grants eek mame his deserts;

But, for his love, a-mong your thoughts alle

As think vp-on my wofulle sorowes smerte.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 65.

Reader to them their desert.

Pa. xxviii. 4.

Those that are able of body and mind he leaves to their deserts.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 12.

=Syn. 1. Desert, Merit, Worth. Desert expresses most and worth least of the thought or expectation of reward. None of them suggests an actual claim. He is a man of great worth or excellence; intellectual worth; moral worth; the merits of the piece are small; he is not likely to get his deserts.

When I compare myself with other men, it seems as if I were more favored by the gods than they, beyond any deserts that I am conscious of.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 144.

A Roman soldier was allowed to plead the merit of his services for his dismissal at such an age.

Dryden, King Arthur, Ded.

Old letters breathing of her worth.

Templeton, Mariana in the South.

desert<sup>3</sup>, n. See desert.

desert-chough (des'-ért-choof), n. A bird of the genus Podiceps.

desertedness (dē-zér'-ted-ness), n. The state of being deserted, uninhabited, or desolate.

It is this metaphysical desertedness and loneliness of the great works of architecture and sculpture that deposits a certain weight upon the heart.

H. James, Jr., Portraits of Places, p. 62.

deserter (dē-zér'-tēr), n. [desert<sup>1</sup>, v., + -er.] Of. D. G. desertor = Dan. Sw. desertör, < F. déserteur = Sp. Pg. desertor = It. disertore, < L. desertor, a deserter, < deservere, pp. desertus, desert: see desert<sup>1</sup>, v.] A person who forsakes his cause, his duty, his party, or his friends; particularly, a soldier or seaman who absents himself from his position without leave, and without the intention of returning.

A deserter, who came out of the citadel, says the garrison is brought to the utmost capacity.

Taiter, No. 58.

Thou, false guardian of a charge too good,

Thou, mean deserter of thy brother's blood!

Pope, Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady, l. 30.

desert-falcon (des'-ért-fā'-kn), n. One of several large true falcons inhabiting deserts and prairies of various parts of the world, sometimes grouped in a subgenus Genneta. They are closely related to the peregrines, but share the dull grayish or brownish coloration which characterizes many birds of arid open regions. The well known lanier of the old world and the prairie-falcon of western North America, Falco mexicanus or F. polygus, are examples.

When any object of desertful pity

Offers itself.

Chapman, Revenge of Busy d'Ambois, iv. 1.

Therein

He shows himself desertful of his happiness.

Ford, Lady's Trial, iv. 1.

desertfully (dē-zér'-fūl-i), adv. Deservedly.

Upon this occasion, Aristotle (and very desertfully) call eth the common-wealth of the Mamluks oligarchia and not aristocrata.

Tuiss's Storehouse, p. 58.

desertion (dē-zér'-shn), n. [= F. desertion = Sp. desercion = Pg. desercão = It. deserrione, < LL. desertio (n.), < L. deservire, pp. desertus, desert: see desert<sup>1</sup>, v.] 1. The act of forsaking or abandoning, as a party, a friend, a cause, or the post of duty; the act of quitting without leave, and with an intention not to return.

In an evil hour for his fame and fortunes he [Fox] . . . abandoned his connection with Pitt, who never forgave this desertion.

Macaulay, William Pitt.

2. The state of being deserted or forsaken. [Rare.]

The desertion in which we lived, the simple benches, the unhewn rafters, the naked walls, all told me what it was I had done.

Godwin, St. Leon, l. 211.

3. The state of being forsaken by God; spiritual despondency. [Not now in use.]

Christ hears and sympathizes with the spiritual agonies of a soul under desertion, or the pressures of some stinging affliction.

South.

4. In law, a wilful abandonment of an employment or a duty, in violation of a legal or moral obligation. Bigelow, Ch. J. In the law of divorce, the wilful withdrawal of one of the married parties from the other, or the voluntary refusal of one to renew a suspended cohabitation, without justification in either the consent or the wrongful conduct of the other. Sheep. — Desertion of the diet, in Scotts law, the abandoning judicially, in a criminal process, of proceedings on the particular libel in virtue of which a panel has been brought into court.

desertless (dē-zér'-les), a. [desert<sup>2</sup> + -less.] Without merit or claim to favor or reward; undeserving.

I was only wondering why Fools, Rascals, and desertless Wretches should still have the better of Men of Merit with all Women, as much as with their own common Mistresses, Fortune.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, iv. 1.

desertlessly (dē-zér'-les-i), adv. Undeservedly. [Rare.]

People will call you valiant — desertlessly, I think; yet, for their satisfaction, I will have you fight with me.

Beau. and Fl., King and No King, iii. 2.

desertness (des'-ért-ness), n. [desert<sup>2</sup>, a., + -ness.] Desert state or condition.

The desertness of the country lying waste & salvage did nothing fears them from coming to him.

J. Ussell, On Lake v.

desertness (dē-zér'-tris), n. [LL. desertus (desertus), fem. of L. desertor, a deserter: see desert<sup>1</sup>.] A female who deserts.

desiccator (des-i-kâ-tôr), n. [< desiccate + -or.] 1. One who or that which desiccates or dries. Specifically—(a) One who prepares desiccated foods. (b) A machine or an apparatus for drying something. A desiccator used in laboratories consists of a porcelain dish with depressions or saucers to receive the substances to be dried, with a closely fitting glass cover and a receptacle for some absorbent of moisture. Commercial desiccators, or evaporators, for fruit, meat, vegetables, milk, etc. operate by the agency of heat, applied either directly or by means of a current of hot air.

2. Same as exsiccator.—Tan-bark desiccator, an apparatus for drying leached tan-bark. The bark is received on an endless apron, which passes through a hopper over the leaching-vat and carries a second hopper, from which it is passed between hollow heated rollers, which express the liquid. E. H. Knight.

desiderated, ppr. desiderating. [*< L. desideratus,
pp. of desiderare, long for, desire: see desire, the earlier form of the same word.*] To feel a desire for or the want of; miss; desire.

We cannot look that his place can ever in all respects be so filled that there will still be much, very much, to desiderate. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 10.

What we desiderate is something which may supersede the need of personal gifts by a far-reaching and infallible rule.

J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 251.

desiderat (dê-sid'ê-rât), n. [Also desiderat; < L. desideratus: see desideratum.] A desire;
a desired thing; preference.

And really gentlemen . . . deprive themselves of many advantages to improve their time, and do service to the desiderata of philosophy.

Swain, To Mr. Maddox.

siderazione, < L. desideratio(n)-, < desiderare, desire: see desiderate, v.*] 1. The act of desiring, or of desiring with sense of want or regret.

Desire is aroused by hope, while desideration is inflicted by reminiscence.

W. Taylor.

2. The thing desiderated; a desideratum. [Rare in both senses.]

desiderative (dê-sid'ê-râ-tiv), a. and n. [*= F.
desideratif = It. desiderativo, < L.L. desiderativus, desiderative, < L. desideratus, pp.: see de-siderate, v.*] I. a. 1. Having or implying desire; expressing or denoting desire: as, a de-siderative verb.—2. Pertaining to a desiderative verb.

Apart from the probable identity of origin between the desiderative and the aoristic "a," there are many cases where any characteristic of desiderative formation is wanting (in Sanskrit).

Amor. Jour. Philol., VI. 2.

II. n. 1. An object of desire; something desired.—2. In gram., a verb formed from an other verb, and expressing a desire of doing the action implied in the primitive verb.

desideratum (dê-sid'ê-râ-tum), a.; pl. deside-rata (-tâ). [= F. Sp. desideratum, < L. desideratum, something desired, noun. of desideratus, pp.: see desiderate.] Something desired or desirable; that which is lacking or required.

The great desiderata are taste and common sense.

Coleridge, Table-Talk.

To feel that the last word has been said on any subject is not a desideratum with the true philosopher, who knows full well that the truth he announces to-day will open half a dozen questions where it settles one.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 292.

desidionet, desidionis (dê-sid'î-on, -us), a. [= Sp. Pg. desidioso, < L. desidiosus, idle, lazy, < desidia, idleness, slothfulness, < desidere, sit long, cf. assign, consign, etc.] I. trans. 1. To draw the outline or figure of, especially of a proposed work of art; trace out; sketch, as a pattern or model.

In the Floor of one of the Octogone Towers they have designed with great accurateness and neatness with ink an Universal Map in a vast Circle.

Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 58.

Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs
The new-elected seat, and draws the lines.

Dryden.

Hence—2. To plan or outline in general; determine upon and mark out the principal features or parts of, as a projected thing or act; plan; devise.

The Roman bridges were designed on the same grand scale as their aqueducts, though from their nature they of course could not possess the same grace and lightness.

desirous (dē-zīr'us), a. [< ME. desirous, < OF. desirous, F. desiroux = Pr. desirous (cf. Sp. deseoso = Pg. deseoso) = It. desideroso, < L. as if **desideriosus, < desiderium*, desire: see desire, n.] 1. Wishing to obtain; wishful; solicitous; anxious; eager.

Be not desirous of his dainties: for they are deceitful meat.

Jesus knew that they were desirous to ask him.

John xvi. 19.

Behold at the door stood a great company of men, as desirous to go in, but durst not.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 105.

2. Desirable.

The kynde de Cent chivalers hym accoured anon with 1100 men, whiche was a worthi knyght and desirous in armes.

Merrin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 103.

desirously (dē-zīr'us-ly), adv. With desire; with earnest wish or longing.

The people of God . . . do with their hearts acknowledge his light and title to them, and do most desirously close with him.

Dates, Everlasting Rest of the Saluta.

desirousness (dē-zīr'us-ness), n. The state of being desirous; affection or emotion of desire.

We shall find a common desirousness in all men to seek their welfare.

desist (dē-sist' or -sist'), v. i. [< OF. desister, F. desister = Sp. Pg. desistir = It. desistere, < L. desistere, intr. leave off, cease, tr. set down, < de, down, + sistere, set, place, causal of stare, stand, = E. stand, q. v. Cf. assist, consist, constit, insist, persist, resist.] To stop; cease from some action or proceeding; forbear: used absolutely or with from.

Ceres, however, desisted not, but fell to her entreaties and lamentations afresh.

Bacon, Physical Fabian, xi.

What do we, then, but draw anew the model In fewer offices; or, at least, desist To build at all?

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 2.

Travelling after fortune is not the way to secure her; and, indeed, of late, I have desisted from the pursuit.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xi.

desistance, desistence (dē-sis'tans, -tans, or dē-sis'tans, -tens), n. [= Sp. Pg. desistencia; as desist + -ance, -ence.] A desisting; a ceasing to act or proceed; a stopping.

Men usually give freeliest where they have not given before; and make it both the motive and excuse of their desistance from giving any more, that they have given already.

Boyle, Works, i. 230.

The creature's sensations will ever prompt desistance from the more laborious course.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., II. 364.

desistive (dē-sis'tiv or -sis'tiv), a. [= Pg. desistivo; as desist + -ive.] Ending; concluding. [Rare.]

desistion (dē-sis'hon), n. [*< L. as if *desistio(n-), < desistere*, pp. desistens, cease: see desistence.] End; termination; conclusion.

The soul must be immortal and unenjoyed to death or desistion. The Soul's Immortality Defended (1648), p. 27.

desitive (des'i-tiv), a. and n. [*< L. as if *desistivus, < desistens*, pp. of desinere, cease: see desistence.] I. a. Final; conclusive.

Inceptive and desitive propositions are of this sort. The fogs vanish as the sun rises, but the fogs have not yet begun to vanish: therefore the sun is not yet risen.

Watts.

II. n. In logic, a proposition which relates to an end or termination.

Inceptive and desitive, which relate to the beginning or ending of anything: as, the Latin tongue is not yet forgotten.

Watts, Logic, II. ii.

desk (desk), n. [< ME. deske, a desk, reading-desk, < OF. desque, disque, F. dique = Sp. Pg. disco = It. desco, a table, < L. discus, a disk, quoit, ML. discus, also desca, a table, desk, whence also AS. disc, E. dish, and mod. E. disc, disk, and, through F., dais, which are thus all ult. the same word: see disk, disk, dais.] A table specially adapted for convenience in writing or reading, frequently made with a sloping top, which may lift on hinges to give access to an interior compartment, as in the ordinary form of school-desk, or combined with drawers, and sometimes with book-shelves; also, a frame or case with a sloping top, intended to rest on a table, and to hold a book or paper conveniently for reading or writing.

The name is sometimes extended to the whole structure or erection to which such a sloping frame is attached, as in the Church of England to the stall from which the morning and evening services are read, in Scotch churches to the stall of the precursor, and in the United States to the pulpit or the lectern in a church.

He is drawn leaning on a desk, with his Bible before him. Walton, Complete Angler

Who first invented work, and bound the free
And holiday rejoicing spirit down
To that dry idleness at the desk's dead wood' Lamb, Work

The pulpit, or as it is here (in Connecticut) called, the desk, was filled by three, if not four, Clergymen Kendall, Travels, 1. 4.

They are common to every species of oratory though of rarer use in the desk. Adams, Lectures on Rhetoric

Roll-top desk. Same as cylinder-desk desk (desk), v. t. [cf. desk, n.] To shut up in or as if in a desk; treasure up. [Rare.]

T. Tomlin (?) Albumazar, 1. 3.

Or if you into some blind convent fly,
You're inquisition d'raught for heresy,
Unless your daring frontpiece can tell
News of a tell or brave miracle,
Then you are entertained and desk'd up by Our Ladies' psalter and the rosary

desk-cloth (desk'klôth), n. Eccl'es., the hanging of the lectern.

desk-work (desk'wërk), n. Work done at a desk; habitual writing, as that of a clerk or a literary man.

All my poor scrapings from a dozen years Of dust and deskwork. Tennyson, Sea Drums.

desma (des'mä), n.; pl. desmata (-mä-tä). [NL., < Gr. desma, a band, < desiv, bind.] A kind of sponge-spicule of polyaxial or irregular figure. See the extract.

Amongst one group of Lithistid sponges (Rhabdocrorida) the normal growth of a strongyle is arrested at an early stage; it then serves as a nucleus upon which further silica is deposited, and in such a manner as to produce a very irregularly branching sclere or desma within which the fundamental strongyle can be seen enclosed. Enger Brit., XXII. 417.

desmachymatous (des-mä-k'ä-mä-tus), a. [cf. desmachyme (-chymat-) + -ous.] Connective, as a sponge-tissue; specifically, of or pertaining to desmachyme: as, a desmachymatous sheath. Sollas.

desmachyme (des'mä-kim), n. [cf. Gr. desma, a band, fetter, + chymos, juice, chiua(-r), a liquid; see chymol.] The proper connective tissue of sponges, arising from desmocytes.

Desmacion (des-mä-s'i-don), n. [NL.] The typical genus of the family Desmacionidae. Bowerbank, 1862.

Desmacionidæ (des-mä-s-i-don'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Desmacion + -idæ.] A family of marine sponges, of the order Cornaciopongia, typified by the genus Desmacion, having diversified megascleres and chelate microcleres. The genera are numerous, and the family is divided into the subfamilies Esperellina and Ectyonina.

desmocyte (des'mä-sit), n. [cf. Gr. desma, a band, fetter, + cyto, a hollow.] One of the cells of connective tissue which occur in most sponges. They are usually long fusiform bodies, consisting of a clear colorless, and often minutely fibrillated sheath, surrounding a highly refractive axial fiber, which is deeply stained by reagents. In some cases the desmocyte is simply a nucleated fusiform cell, with granular contents, fibrillated toward the ends.

desman (des'män), n. [Also sometimes desman; = F. desman = G. desman, < Sw. desman-räta, a desman, lit. 'musk-rat,' < desman, musk; cf. Dan. desmer, musk; leel. des, musk, in comp. des-häs (Clausby), musk-box, smelling-box (häs, räta, rat) being ignored in the E., F., and G. word.] 1. A musk-shrew or musk-rat: the name of two distinct species of aquatic insectivorous mammals of the genus Myogale or Galemys, constituting the subfamily Myogalinae (which see). The Muscovitic desman, M. moschata or muscovitica, is common on the Volga and the Don; it is about 8 inches long, swims and dives with great facility, and lives in holes in the banks. The French desman, M. pyrrhina, is a smaller species with a relatively longer tail, found in southwestern Europe. 2. [rap.] [NL.] A generic name of the musk-shrews. Laopode.

desmata, n. Plural of desma.
Desmia (des'mi-ä), n. [NL. (cf. Desmia for Desmia), < Gr. desmos, binding, bound, < desmos, a band, < desiv, bind.] 1. A genus of the lepidopterous family Pyrallidae, characterized chiefly by the elbowed or knotted antennæ of the male. Of the two described North American species, the more familiar is D. maculata, which is nearly one inch Grape-leaf Folder (Desmia maculata).

1, caterpillar in folded leaf, a head and anterior joints, enlarged.
2, chrysalis. 3, male moth, and 4, female moth, natural size.

in expanse of wings. The general color is brownish black, with a metallic luster. The fore wings bear two large oval white spots, and the hind wings one, usually divided in the female. The larva folds grape-leaves, and is known as the grape-leaf folder.

2. A genus of coelenterates, of the family Turbinulidae. Edwards and Haine, 1848.

desmid, desmidian (des'mid, des-mid'i-an), n. A plant of the order Desmidiaceae.

Desmidiaceæ, Desmidiæ (des-mid-i-ä'sä-sä, des-mid-i-ä'sä), n. pl. [NL., < Desmidium (< Gr. as if desmidion, dim. of desmos, a band, chain), the typical genus, + -aceæ, -ææ.] A natural order of microscopic unicellular fresh-water algae, belonging to the class Confugata. They are usually fræ, but sometimes united in chains which are embedded in mucilage. The cells are cylindrical or fusiform, and sometimes have horn-like processes, or the general outline is circular or elliptic and variously divided, the principal constriction in the middle forming symmetrical halves. Many of the forms are very beautiful. Reproduction takes place by cell-division at the middle and by conjugation. Desmidiaceæ differ from Diatomeæ in their green color and the absence of silicæ. See cut under Cladocium.

desmidian, n. See desmid.

desmidium, n. pl. See Desmidiaceæ.

desmidiologist (des-mid-i-ol'ô-jist), n. [cf. desmidology + -ist.] A botanist who has made a special study of the Desmidiaceæ.

desmidology (des-mid-i-ol'ô-jî), n. [cf. NL. Desmidium (see Desmidiaceæ) + Gr. -logia, < logos, speak; see -ology.] The scientific study of Desmidiaceæ.

desmine (des'min), n. [cf. Gr. desmos, a band, ligament, also, as desmê, a bundle (< desiv, bind), + -ine.] A zeolitic mineral commonly occurring in tufts or bundles of crystals. Also called stilbite (which see).

Desmocerperæ (des'mi-ô-spër-mô-sä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. desmos, binding (see Desmia), + ocypus, seed, + -ææ.] A division of algae, of the order Florideæ, in which the spores are arranged in definite series with respect to a plane or common point of attachment.

desmitis (des'mi-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. desmos, a band, ligament, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of a ligament.

desmo-, [NL., etc., < Gr. desmos, a band or bond, anything for binding or fastening, a halter, cable, strap, chain, etc., < desiv, bind, fasten.] An element in compound words of Greek origin, meaning a 'band,' 'bond,' or 'ligament.'

Desmohacteria (des'mô-bak-tä'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. desmos, a band, + bacteria, a staff (mod. bacterium, bacteria).] A group of genera of filiform bacteria with elongated cylindrical joints, isolated, or united into more or less extended chains. It includes the genera Bacillus, Leptothrix, etc.

Desmobrya (des-mob'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. desmos, a band, chain, + bryon, a kind of mossy seaweed.] Ferns in which the fronds are produced at the tip of the rootstock or caudex, and the stipes are continuous with it (not articulated). This is the case with most ferns; but in the tribe represented by Polypodium the stipes are articulated with the rootstock (erembryoid).

desmobyoid (des-mob'ri-oid), a. [cf. Desmobrya + -oid.] Resembling or having the characters of the Desmobrya.

Desmodactylus (des-mô-dak'ti-lus), n. pl. [NL., pl. of desmodactylus; see desmodactylus.] A name given by Forbes to the family Eurylamidae considered as a superfamily group of Passeres, and distinguished from all other Passeres (or Eleutherodactyls) by having a strong band joining the muscles of the hind toe, as in many non-passerine birds.

Desmodactylus (des-mô-dak'ti-lus), a. [NL., < Gr. desmos, a band, + dactylus, finger, toe.] Having the flexor tendons of the toes bound together, as in the Desmodactylus: distinguished from eleutherodactylus.

Desmodidæ (des-mô-dä-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Desmodus (stem prop. Desmodont-) + -idæ.] The Desmodontæ as a family of bats.

Desmodium (des-mô-di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. as if desmôdion, like a chain, < desmos, a chain, + -dion, form. Cf. desmoid.] A genus of leguminous plants, herbs or shrubs, with pinnately trifoliate (rarely simple) leaves, small flowers, and flat, deeply lobed and jointed pods.

Each joint of the pod is one-seeded and usually covered with minutely hooked hairs. There are about 125 species, tropical in Asia, and also extra-tropical in America, Africa, and Australia. The United States flora includes 35 species. The most remarkable member of the genus is an Indian species, D. gyrans, the telegraph plant, so called from the spontaneous movement of its leaflets.

Telegraph plant (Desmodium gyrans)

Desmodont (des'mô-dont), a. and n. I. a. In conch., of or pertaining to the Desmodonta.

II. n. One of the Desmodonta.

Desmodonta (des-mô-don'tä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. desmos, a band, + dontis (< dontis) = E. tooth.] A group or order of bivalve mollusks, with the hinge-teeth absent or irregular (in the latter case connected by the ligamental processes), two equal muscular impressions or eboria, and a sinuate pallial line. It includes the families Myda, Anahidæ, Macridæ, Solenidæ, etc.

Desmodontes (des-mô-don'täz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Desmodus. Cf. Desmodontæ.] A group of Central and South American bats, represented by the genera Desmodus and Diphylla, and sometimes elevated to the rank of a family, Desmodontæ. They have a long intestine-like caecal diverticulum of the stomach, and in which the blood that they suck flows and in which it is stored; incisors 1 in each upper and 2 in each lower half-jaw, the upper house, case), des-kötr (Haldorsen), 'musk-cat,' civet-cat (kötr, cat), des-lygt (Haldorsen), the smell of musk (lygt, prop. lykt, = Dan. lykt, smell); the second element of the Sw. name are the true vampires, in the sense of bloodsuckers, and the only ones in the new world known to have the habit, though the term vampire is commonly applied, like the name of the genus Vampyrus, to numerous large insectivorous and frugivorous species of a different section.

Desmodus (des-mō-dus), n. [NL., < Gr. desmōs, a band, chain, + odous (dōur-) = E. tooth.] A remarkable genus of South American phyllostomine bats, typical of the group Desmodontes, family Phyllostomatidae, having no molar teeth and no calcar. D. rufus, a common and troublesome blood-sucking species, is the type.

Desmognathus (des-mog-nā-thē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (sc. L. aves, birds) of desmognathus: see desmognathus.] In Huxley's classification of birds (1867), a group exhibiting what is called the "bound-palate" type of structure of the upper jaw, as in those wading and swimming birds which are not schizognathous, in the birds of prey, and in various non-passerine perching birds. See desmognathism.

Desmognathids (des-mog-nath'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Desmognathus + -idae.] A family of gradient or tailed amphibians, typified by the genus Desmognathus. The series of palatine teeth are transverse, and on the posterior portion of vomers; the dentigerous plates are on the parapsphenoid; the vertebrae are opisthocentral; the parapsphenoid teeth are in two elongate patches; and the tongue is free laterally and behind.

desmognathism (des-mog-nā-thizm), n. [As desmognath-ous + -ism.] In ornith., the "bound-palate" type of palatal structure, such as is exhibited, for example, by a duck, pelican, hawk, or parrot; the state or quality of being desmognathous. The vomer is either abortive or very small (when existing it usually tapers to a point in front); the maxillopalatine are united across the median line, either directly or by means of ossifications in the nasal septum; and the posterior ends of the palatines and the anterior ends of the pterygoids articulate directly with the rostrum of the sphenoid (as in schizognathism). Recognized varieties of this formation are: (a) direct; (b) indirect; (c) imperfectly direct; (d) imperfectly indirect; (e) double; (f) compound. W. K. Parker, Breyc. Brit.

desmognathous (des-mog-nā-thus), a. [NL., < Desmognathus, < Gr. desmōs, a band, + gnathos, a jaw.] Having the "bound-palate" type of structure; exhibiting desmognathism; belonging or relating to the Desmognathidae: as, a desmognathous palate; a desmognathous bird.

desmography (des-mog'grā-fī), n. [Gr. desmōs, a band, ligament, + -graphia, < graphein, write.] A description of the ligaments of the body.

desmoid (des'moid), a. [Gr. desmōs, a band, bundle, ligament, + -eidos, form.] Resembling a bundle. Specifically—(a) In pathol., applied to certain firm and tough fibromata or tumors which, on section, present numerous white, glistening fibers, intimately interwoven or arranged in bundles, constituting circles or loops intercrossing one another. (b) In anat. and anat., ligamentous; tendinous; aponeurotic; sinewy: said of fibrous tissues which bind parts together.

desmology (des-mol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. desmōs, a band, ligament, + -logia, < logos, speak: see -ology.] The anatomy of the ligaments.

Desmomyaria (des-mō-mī-ā-rī-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. desmōs, a band, + myria, a muscle (see muse, muscle), + -aria.] A group of free-swimming tunicates or ascidians, the salps, regarded as an order of Thaliacea: opposed to Cyclomyaria. See Salpidae.

Desmoneus (des-mong'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. desmōs, a band, + nyx, barb; so called from the long, attenuate, and strongly hooked ends of the leafstalks.] A genus of palms found in the forests of tropical America. They have long, slender, flexible stems, climbing among the branches of trees by the stout recurved spines which arm the elongated rachis of the pinnate leaves. The fruit is small and globose. There are about 25 species.

desmopalmus (des-mō-pel'mus), a. [Gr. desmōs, a band, + palmus, the sole of the foot, +

-ous.] In ornith., having the plantar tendons bound together; having the flexor hallucis muscle connected by a band with the flexor digitorum, so that the hind toe cannot be bent independently of the front toes. The several ways in which the union occurs are distinguished as antipalmous, sympalmous, and heteropalmous: opposed to nonpalmous or schizopalmous: as, a desmopalmous disposition of the tendons; a desmopalmous bird.

Desmoscolex (des-mō-skō'leks), n. [NL., < Gr. desmōs, a band, + skolēx, a worm, esp. the earthworm.] The typical genus of nematoid threadworms of the family Desmoscolecidae, notable in having the body much more distinctly segmented than that of other Nematodea, and the papillae and setae resembling those of annelids.

Desmoscolicids (des'mō-skō-lī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Desmoscolex (-līe-) + -idae.] An aberrant group of nematoid worms, typified by the genus Desmoscolex.

Desmosticha (des-mos'tī-kē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. desmōs, a band, + stichos, a row, a line.] The endocyclic or regular sea-urchins, having the ambulacra equal and band-like, and not expanded as in the Petalostichidae or spatangoids. The group consists of the families Cidaridae, Echinidae, Echinometridae, etc. See cuts under Cidaridae and Echinidae.

desmostichous (des-mos'tī-kus), a. [Gr. Desmosticha + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Desmosticha.

desmotentid (des-mō-tē'tid), n. A squid of the family Desmotentidae.

Desmotentids (des-mō-tē'tī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Desmotentis + -idae.] A family of decapod crustaceans, typified by the genus Desmotentis. The body is much elongated, and the siphon has three peculiar special thickenings, or raised processes, in its basal portion.

Desmotentis (des-mō-tē'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. desmōs, a band, + tentis, a squid.] A genus of squids, giving name to the family Desmotentidae: a synonym of Tuonius.

desmotomy (des-mot'ō-mī), n. [Gr. desmōs, a band, ligament, + -tomy, < tomē, cutting: see anatomy.] The act or art of dissecting ligaments.

desocialization (dē-sō'shāl-i-zā'shōn), n. [Gr. desocialize (< de- priv. + social + -ize) + -ation.] The act of rendering unsocial; the derangement or loss of social instincts or habits. Also spelled desocialisation.

Their [hysterical women's] example proves also how the derangement of the social sense leads naturally and inevitably to a deterioration of moral feeling and will; it is demoralization following desocialization. Maudeley, Body and Will, p. 258.

desolate (des'ō-lāt), r. t.; pret. and pp. desolated, pp. desolating. [Gr. desolatus, < L. desolatus, pp. of desolare > It. desolare = Sp. desolar = F. désoler, leave alone, forsake, abandon, < de- intensive + solare, make lonely, lay waste, desolate, < solus, alone: see sole.] 1. To render lonely, as a place or region, by depopulation or devastation; make desert; lay waste; ruin; ravage.

The island of Atlantis was not swallowed by an earthquake, but was desolated by a particular deluge. Bacon.

Those who with the gun, Worse than the season, desolate the fields. Thomson, Winter.

Wind-blown hair Of comets, desolating the dim air. A. C. Swinburne, Anactoria.

We hear of storms washing away and desolating the islands (atolls) to an extent which astonished the inhabitants. Darwin, Coral Reefs, p. 100.

2. To overwhelm with grief; afflict; make very sorry or weary: as, his heart was desolated by his loss; your misfortune desolates me; to be desolated by annul. [In the last example a Gallicism.]

desolate (des'ō-lāt), a. [Gr. desolatus, < L. desolatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Solitary; lonely; without companionship; forsaken.

Many a gentill lady be lefte widows, and many a gentill mayden dyed, and with-outen counsell. North (E. E. T. S.), iii. 500.

No one is so accused by fate, No one so utterly desolate, But some heart, though unknown, Responds unto his own. Longfellow, Endymion.

Hope touched her heart; no longer desolate, Deserted of all creatures did she feel. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, l. 224.

2. Overwhelmed with grief; deprived of comfort; afflicted.

And in hym self they stode soo desolate; Whanne kyng Baylyn saw they were putte to flight, That in noo wyle they wold no longer fight. Genarydes (E. E. T. S.), i. 3022.

So Tamar remained desolate in her brother Absalom's house. 2 Sam. xiii. 30.

My heart within me is desolate. Ps. cxlii. 4.

3. Destitute; lacking.

I were ryght now of tales desolat. Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 22.

4. Destitute of inhabitants; uninhabited; lonely; abandoned: as, a desolate wilderness; desolate altars; desolate towers.

I will make the cities of Judah desolate, without an inhabitant. Jer. ix. 11.

Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Mat. xxiii. 32, 39.

A desolate island. Browne.

This delicious Flain is now almost desolate, being suffer'd, for want of culture, to run up to rank weeds. Maundrell, Alleppe to Jerusalem, p. 52.

Any one who sees the desolate country about Jerusalem may conclude what a sad alteration all these parts have undergone since the time of Josephus, who says that the whole territory abounded in trees. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 24.

5. Lost to shame; abandoned; dissolute.

Ever the heyer he is of estant, The more he is founden. Chaucer, Pardoner's Tale, l. 126.

= Syn. 1. Companionless.—2. Forlorn, cheerless, miserable, wretched.—3. Abandoned, unfrequented, lonely, waste, wild, barren, dreary.

desolately (des'ō-lāt-lī), adv. In a desolate manner; as one forsaken, abandoned, or overwhelmed with ruin or grief.

Nehemiah, whom all the pleasures of the Persian court could not satisfy, whilst Jerusalem was desolately miserable. Bates, Works, IV. iv.

desolateness (des'ō-lāt-nēs), n. The state of being desolate, in any sense of the word.

In so great discomfort it hath pleased God some ways to regard my desolateness. Bacon, Works, VI. 22.

Cf. respond.] To lose heart, resolution, or hope; be cast down; be depressed or dejected in mind.

The Pilgrims then, especially Christian, began to despond, and looked this way and that, but could find no way by which to escape the River.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 210.

Others depress their own minds [and] despond at the first difficulty. Locke.

The men who labour and digest things most will be much apter to despond than boys.
Reasoner, On Translated Verse, I. 162.

I should despair, or at least despond. Scott, Lettem.

=Syn. Despair, Despond. Despond implies a total loss of hope; despond does not. Despondency produces a disposition to relax or relinquish effort; despair generally stops all effort. See despair, n.

I shall despair.—There is no creature loves me.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 2.

I have seen, without desponding even for a moment, the hours which America has styled her gloomy ones.

Washington, in Bancroft's Hist. Const., I. 281.

despond (des-pond'), n. [< despond, v.] Despondency. [Archaic.]

This miry slough is the descent whither the scum and filth that attends conviction for sin doth continually run; and therefore it is called the Slough of Despond.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress.

despondence (des-pond'ens), n. [< despondent (t) + -ce.] A despondent condition; despondency. [Rare.]

The people, when once infected, lose their relih for happiness, saunter about with looks of despondence.
Goldsmith, 'Citizen of the World, Ixviii.

despondency (des-pond'gn-si), n. [< despondent (t) + -cy.] A sinking or dejection of spirits from loss of hope or courage in affliction or difficulty; deep depression of spirit.

Let not disappointment cause despondency, nor difficulty despair.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., I. 1.

We poets in our youth begin in gladness;
But thereof come in the end despondency and madness.
Wordsworth, Resolution and Independence, st. 7.

=Syn. Desperation, etc. (see despair), discouragement, melancholy, gloom.

despondent (des-pond'ent), a. [< L. despondent (t-s), pp. of despondere, despond: see despond, v.] Losing courage; falling into dejection; depressed; spiritless.

A man might be despondent had he spent a lifetime on a difficult task without a gleam of encouragement.
Jerome, Pol. Econ., II. 8.

despondently (des-pond'ent-li), adv. In a despondent manner.

He thus despondently concludes.
Barrow, Sermons, p. 319.

desponder (des-pond'ér), n. One whodesponds.

I am no desponder in my nature. Swift.

desponding (des-pond'ing), p. a. Given to or caused by despondency; despondent.

There is no surer remedy for desponding and desponding weakness than . . . when we have done our own parts, to commit all cheerfully, for the rest, to the good pleasure of Heaven.

Sir R. L. Estange.

despondingly (des-pond'ing-li), adv. In a desponding manner; with dejection of spirits.

Swift, without a penny in his purse, was despondingly looking out of his window to gaze away the time.

Sheridan, Swift.

desponsate (des-pon'sā), n. [As desponsate + -age.] Betrothal.

Ethelbert . . . went peaceably to King Offa for desponsage of Athlith, his daughter.

Pope, Martyrs, p. 103.

desponsate (des-pon'sāt), v. t. [< L. desponsare, pp. of desponsare (> It. desposare = Sp. Pg. desposar), betroth, intensive of despondere, pp. desponsatus, promise to give: see spouse and despond, v.] To betroth. Cockeram.

desponsation (des-pon-sā'shūn), n. [< LL. desponsatio (n.) < L. desponsare, betroth: see desponsate.] A betrothing.

For all this desponsation of her (Mary), according to the desire of her parents, and the custom of the nation, she had not set one step toward the consummation of her marriage.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1838), I. 22.

desponsary (des-pon'sō-ri), n. [< LL. desponsor, one who betroths, < L. despondere, pp. desponsus, betroth. See desponsate.] A written betrothal. Forcester.

despot (des'pot), n. [Formerly also despote; = D. despot = G. Dan. Sw. despot, < OF. despot, despot, F. despote = Sp. despota = Pg. despota = It. despota, despota, < ML. despota, despota, < Gr. despōtēs, a master, lord, ruler, appar. orig. comp. < des-, origin unknown, + potēs, later potis, husband, orig. master, = Skt. pātā, lord, = Lith. pātis, lord, = L. pōtis, able, cf. L. potens (t-s), strong, potent: see potent, posse.] 1. An absolute ruler; one who governs according to his own will, under a recognized right or custom, but uncontrolled by constitutional restrictions or the wishes of his subjects; a sovereign who is himself theoretically the source of all law.

The case of Pannania and other such cases were regarded by the Spartans themselves as showing the tendency of generals to become despots.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 280.

The nation knew that the king was not an arbitrary despot, but a sovereign bound by oaths, laws, policies, and necessities, over which they had some control.

Shak., Const. Hist., § 280.

Despot.—3. A tyrant; an oppressor; one who or a body which exercises lawful power tyrannically or oppressively, as either sovereign or master.

A despot is the individual or class in whose favour and for whose benefit such a government is carried on. A despot may thus include any number of persons from unity upward—from a monarch to a mob. Chambers's Magazine.

3. An honorary title of the Byzantine emperors, afterward of members of their families, and then conferred as a title of office on vassal rulers and governors: as, the despots of Epirus.

Paologos was both by the patriarchs and the young emperor honored with the title of the despot, another step into the empire. Knox's Hist. Turke, p. 112 (Ord MS.). =Syn. Autocrat, dictator.

despotat (des'pot-at), n. [F. despotat; < despot + -at<sup>3</sup>.] Government by a despot; the territory governed by a despot. See despot, 3. [Rare.]

The absence of all feudal organization . . . gave the despot of Epirus a Byzantine type. Finley, Medieval Greece and Trebizond, vi. § 1.

despotie, n. An obsolete form of despot.
despotic, despotic (des'pot'ik, i-ka), a. [= OF. despotique; = Sp. despotico; = Pg. It. despotic (cf. D. G. despotic; = Dan. Sw. despotic), < Gr. despotiké, of a lord or despot, < despótē, a lord, despot; see despot.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a despot or despotism; unlimited; arbitrary; tyrannical: as, a despotic ruler; despotic government or power; a despotic will.

We may see in a neighbouring government the ill consequences of having a despotic prince.

Addison.
In a barbarous age the imagination exercises a despotic power. Macaulay, Dryden.

Despotic monarchy. See monarchy. =Syn. Autocratic, imperious, dictatorial.

despotically (des'pot'i-ka-li), adv. In a despotic manner; with unlimited power; arbitrarily.

Alike in Hindu and in Russian village-communities we find the group of habitations, each despotically ruled by a pater-familias. J. Fish, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 41.

despoticness (des'pot'i-ka-li-nes), n. The quality of being despotic; absolute or arbitrary authority.

despoticon (des'pot'i-ko-n), n. [Gr. despotikon (sc. oúpa, body), the Lord's body (the name being given by specialization to the largest portion of the host), neut. of despotiké, of the Lord, of a lord or despot; see despotic.] In the Coptic ('k), the central part of the oöban or oblate, occupying the intersection of the upright and transverse pieces of the cross marked upon it. The despoticon itself is divided by a cross into four divisions, the whole oblate containing sixteen. Also tebdoicon and apoudoicon.

The Priest . . . dips the despoticon in the chalice. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 321.

despotism (des'pot-izm), n. [= F. despotisme; = Sp. Pg. despotismo; = It. despotismo; = D. despotie, despotismus; = G. despotismus; = Dan. despotisme; = Sw. despotism; = as despot + -ism.] 1. Absolute power; authority unlimited and uncontrolled by constitutional restrictions, and depending only on the will of the prince: as, the despotism of Louis XIV.

We are ready to wonder that the best gifts are the most sparingly bestowed, and rashly to conclude that despotism is the decree of heaven, because by far the largest part of the world lies bound in its fetters. Ames, Works, ii. 258.

[Cæsar Borgia] tolerated within the sphere of his iron despotism no plunderer or oppressor but himself. Macaulay, Machiavelli.

2. An arbitrary government; the rule of a despot; absolutism; autocracy.

Even the mighty Roman Republic, . . . after attaining the highest point of power, passed, seemingly under the operation of irresistible causes, into a military despotism. Calhoun, Works, i. 83.

The Roman government, at least from the time of Diocletian and Constantine, was a pure and absolute despotism. Stillé, Stud. Med. Hist., p. 23.

3. Figuratively, absolute power or controlling influence.

Such is the despotism of the imagination over untaught minds. Macaulay.

=Syn. 1. Despotism, Tyranny, Autocracy, Absolutism. All these words imply absolute power. Tyranny is the abuse of absolute power, legal or usurped, and implies oppression. Despotism, in its earlier and still frequent meaning, does not necessarily imply either regard or disregard for the welfare of the subject; but there is also a tendency to give it essentially the same meaning as tyranny, using absolutism or autocracy where an unfavorable meaning is not intended. See oppression.

The cruelty and inhumanity which flourished in the [Roman] republic, professing freedom, found a natural home under the emperors—the high priests of despotism. Brewster, Orations, i. 215.

Is there any tyranny anywhere equal to that which a savage ruler exercises upon his subjects, with abject submission on their part, in enforcing the sacred "customs" of the tribe? Macaulay, Body and Will, p. 178.

As a champion of Absolutism, and of the Church, Charles Felix was naturally attracted towards Austria.

E. Dwyer, Victor Emmanuel, v.

despotist (des'pot-ist), n. [< despot + -ist.] One who supports or who is in favor of despotism. [Rare.]

I must become as thorough a despotist and imperialist as Strafford himself. Kingsley, Life, ii. 63.

despotize (des'pot-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. despotized, ppr. despotizing. [= F. despotiser; = as despot + -ize.] To be a despot; act the part of a despot; be despotize.

despotocracy (des'pot-ok'ra-si), n. [< Gr. despoták, despot, + -krátia, < krátiv, govern; see -ocracy.] Government by a despot; despotism as a principle of government. [Rare.]

Despotocracy, the worst institution of the middle ages, the leprosy of society, came over the water; the slave survived the priest, the noble the king. Theodore Parker, Works, v. 202.

despumate (dē-spū'māt or des'pū'māt), v.; pret. and pp. despumated, ppr. despumating. [< L. despumatus, pp. of despumare (> F. despuumer = Sp. despuumar = It. despuumare), skim off, deposit a frothy matter, < de, off, + spuma, foam, < spuma, foam; see spume.] I. Intrans. To throw off impurities; froth; form froth or scum; clarify. [Rare.]

That discharge is a benefit to the constitution, and will help it the sooner and faster to despumate and purify, and so to get into perfect good health. G. Chyney, English Malady, p. 304.

II. trans. To throw off in froth. [Rare.]

They were thrown off and despumated upon the larger excretory and open glands. G. Chyney, English Malady, p. 300.

despumation (des'pū-mā'shon), n. [= F. despumation; = Sp. despumación, < L. despumatio (> L. despuumare), skim off; see despumate.] The rising of excrementitious matter to the surface of a liquor in the form of froth or scum; a scumming.

desquamate (des-kwā'māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. desquamated, ppr. desquamating. [< L. desquamatus, pp. of desquamare (> F. desquammer), scale off, < de, off, + squama, scale.] To scale off; peel off; exfoliate; be shed, cast, or molted in the form of scales or flakes.

The cuticle now begins to desquamate.

S. Pilsbry, Diseases of the Skin.

desquamation (des-kwā'mā'shon), n. [= F. desquamation; = as desquamate + -ion.] The process of desquamating; a scaling or exfoliation, as of skin or bone; especially, separation of the epidermis in scales or patches: a common result of certain diseases, as scarlatina.

The separation of the cuticle in small branny fragments—in one word, desquamation.

Sir T. Watson, Lectures on Physics, xi.

desquamative (des-kwā'mā-tiv), a. [< desquamate + -ive.] Relating to, consisting in, or partaking of the character of desquamation.—Desquamative nephritis, a nephritis in which the epithelium of the urinary tubules and Malpighian bodies is shed to a greater or less extent.

desquamatory (des-kwā'mā-tō-ri), a. and n. [< desquamate + -ory.] I. a. Relating to desquamation; desquamative.

II. n. Pl. desquamatories (-ris). In surg., a kind of trepan formerly used for removing the laminae of exfoliated bones.

deas (des), n. [E. dial. and Sc., also dase; < Ice. dea, a heap, mound (in comp. key-dea, a hay-stack).] 1. A portion cut from a hay-stack with a hay-knife for immediate use.—2. The portion of a sheaf or lot of grain or of a stack of hay which is left when a part is removed for use.

deas (des), v. t. [E. dial. and Sc., < deas, n.] 1. To lay close together; pile in order.—2. To cut (a section of hay) from a stack. Hallivell.

desseit, n. [ME. des, deas, deis, a dais; see dais.] An obsolete form of dais.

And next to her mate goodly Shamefastness,
Ne ever durst her eyes from ground uprear, Ne ever once did look up from her desseit. Spenser, F. Q. IV. x. 20.

dessert (de-sért' or -sért'), n. [Sometimes spelled dessert; < OF. dessert, F. dessert, dessert, < deservir, clear the table, < des, de, away, + servir, serve; see serve.] A service of fruits and sweetmeats at the close of a repast; the last course at table: in the United States often used to include pies, puddings, and other sweet dishes.

At your dessert bright pewter comes too late,
When your first course was well serv'd up in plate. W. King, Art of Cookery.

The supper, with a handsome dessert, would do honour to the Guildhall.

Quoted in First Year of a Silex Reign, p. 108.

Dessert-service, the dishes, plates, etc., used in serving dessert.

dessert-spoon (de-sért'spūn), n. A spoon intermediate in size between a table-spoon and a tea-spoon, used for eating dessert.

desiatina, desyatina (des'ya-tin), n. [< Russ. desyatina, a measure of land (see def.), lit. a tenth, < desyat = E. ten, q. v.] A Russian land measure equal to 2.702 English acres. Also written desiatina, desmatina, and (Latinized) desatina, and, improperly, desatine.

The right of personal vote belongs to those who possess 100 male serfs, or 800 desiatinas of ground. Brougham.

The calculation is made per desyatine, or, as we should say, per acre. D. M. Waller, Russia, p. 518.

It is singular, however, that where the extent of productive forest in Russia is smaller, the yield per desyatina is greater. Nature, XXX. 288.

dessus (de-sū'), n. [F. dessus, soprano, lit. upper part, noun use of dessus, over, upon, < de, from, + sus, over, upon, < L. sussum, occasional contr. of sursum, above, up, upward, contr. of suborsum, < sub, below, + orsum, orig. neut. pp. of vertere, turn; cf. sub-ver-t.] The French name for soprano, formerly used also by English musicians.

destinally (des'ti-nal), a. [ME., < destine + -al.] Pertaining to destiny; determined by destiny; fated.

But I axe yif ther be any libertie of fre wil, in this ordre of causes, that clyven this togidre in hymself, or elles I wolde if that the destynal chayne cōstrenynth the movynges of the corages of men. Chaucer, Boethius, v. prose 2.

destinate (des'ti-nāt), v. t. [< L. destinatus, pp. of destinare, destine; see destine.] To design or appoint; destine.

A destructive God, to create our souls, and destinate them to eternal damnation. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 652.

Decking their houses with branches of cypresses: a tree destinated to the dead. Sandys, Travels, p. 68.

Birds are destinated to fly among the branches of trees and bushes. Ray, Works of Creation.

destinate (des'ti-nāt), a. [< L. destinatus, pp.: see the verb.] Appointed; destined; determined.

Ye are destinate to another dwelling than here on earth. J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 222.

destination (des'ti-nā'shon), n. [< OF. destination, destinacion, F. destination = Fr. destinacio = Sp. destinacion = Pg. destinacão = It. destinazione, < L. destinatio (> destinare, pp. of destinare, destine; see destine.)] 1. The act of destining or appointing; appointment; designation.

Designed by nature . . . for the propagation of the species; which destination . . . appears to have been pre-ordained by the author of mankind for the continuation of it. Boyle, Works, v. 422.

2. The purpose for which anything is intended or appointed; end or ultimate design; pre-determined object or use: as, every animal is fitted for its destination.

The passages through which spirits are conveyed to the members, being almost infinite, and each of them drawn through so many meanders, it is wonderful that they should perform their regular destinations without losing their way. Glanville, Scap. Sci.

3. The place to which a thing is appointed or directed; the predetermined end of a journey, voyage, or course of transmission; goal: as, the ship's destination was unknown; the destination of a letter or package.—4. In Scots law, a term, generally speaking, applied to the series of heirs called to the succession of heritable or movable property, by the provision of the law or title, or by the will of the proprietor: but usually applied in a more limited sense to a nomination of successors in a certain order, regulated by the will of the proprietor.—Syn. 2. Purpose, intention, lot, fate.—3. Goal, harbor, haven.

destine (des'tin), v. t.; pret. and pp. destined, pp. destining. [ME. destinen, destynen, < OF. destiner, F. destiner = Pr. Sp. Pg. destinar = It. destinare, < L. destinare, make fast, establish, determine, design, intend, destine, appar. < de- intensive + stin-are, an assumed form, < stare, stand: see stand.] 1. To set apart, ordain, or appoint to a use, purpose, office, or place.

The rain comes down, it comes without our call,
Each pattering drop knows well its destined place.
Jones Verry, Poems, p. 87.

The tyrant could not bear to see the triumph of those whom he had destined to the gallows and the quartering-block.
Macaulay, Nugent's Hampden.

What fitter use
Was ever husband's money destined to?
Brownson, King and Book, II. 139.

2. To appoint or predetermine unalterably, as by a divine decree; doom; devote.

And makes us with reflective trouble see
That all is destin'd, which we fancy free.
Prior, Solomon, III.

We are decreed,
Reserved, and destined to eternal woe.
Milton, P. L., II. 160.

Not enjoyment and not sorrow
Is our destined end or way.
Longfellow, Psalm of Life.

[< ME. destynic, destenye, destenece, destene, destyne, < OF. destinee, F. destinée = Pr. destinada = It. destinata, < *ML. as if *destinata*, destiny, prop. pp. fem. of L. destinare, destine: see destine.] 1. An irresistible tendency of certain events to come about by force of predetermination, whatever efforts may be made to prevent them; overruling necessity; fate.

On Monday by good destiny we shall move alle to go towards Clarence.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), III. 582.

You are three men of sin, whom destiny (That hath to instrument this lower world And what is in 't) the never-surfelt sea Hath caus'd to helch up.
Shak., Tempest, III. 3.

With the Stoicks they [the Turks] attribute all accidents to destiny, and constellations at birth.
Sandys, Travels, p. 45.

Whate'er betides, by destiny 'tis done;
And better bear like men than vainly seek to shun.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., I. 249.

2. That which is predetermined and sure to come true.

The kith that hee come for or hee com till,
Hee shall bee doliun [buried] & ded as destiny fallen.
Alexander of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), I. 1038.

'Tis destiny unshunnable, like death.
Shak., Othello, III. 3.

3. That which is to become of any person or thing in the future; fortune; lot; luck; often in the plural.

Now wot I neuer in this world of wham y am come, ne what destiny me is dight, but god do his wille!
William of Palerm (E. E. T. S.), I. 816.

As a Fish cannot live out of Water, no more was it in the Destiny of this King [Stephen] to live out of Trouble.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 51.

The destinies of the human race were staked on the same cast with the freedom of the English people.
Macaulay.

The revolutions in England could not but affect the destinies of the colonies.
Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 195.

4. [cap.] pl. In classical myth., the Fates or Parcae; the powers supposed to preside over human life. See fate.

Destinies do out his thread of life.
Shak., Pericles, I. 2.

The destinies, or the natures and fates of things, are justly made Pan's sisters.
Bacon, Fable of Pan.

The Destinies, I hope, have pointed out
Our emils alike, that thou mayst die for love,
Though not for me.
Beau. and Fl., King and no King, IV. 2.

Manifest destiny, that which clearly appears destined to come to pass; a future state, condition, or event which can be foreseen with certainty, or is regarded as inevitable. This phrase has been much used in American politics, especially about the time of the Mexican war, by those who believed that the United States were destined in time to occupy the entire continent.

The manifest destiny of the "Anglo-Saxon" race and the huge dimensions of our country are favorite topics with Fourth-of-July orators, but they are none the less interesting on that account when considered from the point of view of the historian. J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 102.

=ME. Destiny, Fate, Doom. Fate is stronger than destiny, and less the appointment of a personal being or other discernible cause; but the words are often used interchangeably. Doom is an unhappy destiny.

No man of woman born,
Coward or brave, can shun his destiny.
Dryden, Illud., VI.

Love is not in our choice, but in our fate.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., I. 239.

In the midst of its revels [the Greek world] trembled at the thought of the doom that was awaiting it; despair was at its heart.
Faiths of the World, p. 172.

destituent (des-tit'ū-ent), a. [< L. destituent (-t), pp. of destituere, forsake; improp. used in sense of 'wanting': see destitute.] Wanting; deficient.

When any condition . . . is destituent or wanting, the duty itself falls. Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, I. 446.

destitute (des'ti-tūt), r. t. [< L. destitutus, pp. of destituere (> F. destituer = Pr. Sp. Pg. destituir = It. destituere), set down, put away, leave alone, forsake, abandon, desert, < de- down, away, + statuere, set, put, place, < status, a position: see status, state, and cf. constitute, institute.] 1. To forsake; desert; abandon; leave to neglect.

We see also that the sciences of medicine, if it be des-tituted and forsaken by natural philosophy, it is not much better than an empirical practice.

A strong detachment of Sarnfield's troops approached.

Macaulay, Mil. Eng., ix.

Sparta . . . sent a detachment to support the partisans of aristocracy in Argolis, Achaia, and Aroalia.

J. Adams, Works, IV, 407.

4. An order detaching an officer from duty at a given station.—Gun detachment, the men detailed for the service of a gun or mortar.

detail (dê-tâi'), v. [< OF. détaillier, détailler, détaillier, F. détailler (= Sp. detallar = Pg. detalhar = It. dettagliare, stagiare, cut up, divide, cf. dettagliare, after F., detail, cut up, retail, narrate in particulars), < de-, L. dis-, apart, + tailler, cut: see tail<sup>2</sup>, tailor, tally, and cf. retail.] 1. trans. 1. To divide or set off; specifically, to set apart for a particular service; appoint to a separate duty: chiefly in military use: as, to detail a corporal's guard for fatigue duty or as an escort; to detail an officer.—2. To relate, report, or narrate in particulars; recite the particulars of; particularize; tell fully and distinctly: as, to detail all the facts in due order.

Strange as the events *detail*ed in the succeeding narrative may appear, they are . . . true to the letter.

Berkham, Ingoldsby Legends, I, 176.

He *detail*ed to them the history of all the past transactions.

Present, Ford, and Jan., II, 6.

II. intrans. To give details or particulars about something.

There were occasions when they [monastic writers] were inevitably graphic,—when they detail like a witness in court.

F. D'Irasci, Amen., of Lit., I, 373.

To detail on the plane, in arch., to appear in profile or section on a plane as a molding which abuts against the plane, or is cut by it.

detail (dê-tâi' or dê-tâl'), n. [= D. G. Dan. detail = Sw. detalj, < OF. detaill, F. détail (= Sp. detalle = Pg. detalhe = It. dettaglio), detail, retail; from the verb.] 1. An individual part; an item; a particular: as, the account is accurate in all its details; the point objected to is an unimportant detail; collectively (without a plural), particulars; particulars considered separately and in relation to the whole: as, a matter of detail.

It is a fact of history and of observation that all efficient men, while they have been men of comprehension, have also been men of detail.

Bushnell, Sermons for New Life, p. 293.

2. In the fine arts, etc., a relatively small, subordinate, and particular part, as distinguished from a general conception or from larger parts or effects; also, such parts collectively (in the singular).

One or two capitals show that the Ragnan architect knew of the actual Renaissance. But it was only in that one detail that he went astray.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 251.

The Assyrian honeycomb . . . forms an elegant architectural detail as is anywhere to be found.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I, 254.

In the works of Alma Tadema, the most careful study of antiquarian detail is united to an artist's vivid recollection of the colour and sunshine of the North.

F. G. Hamerton, Graphic Arts, iv.

There is a castle at Nantes which resembles . . . that of Angers, but has . . . within, much more interest of detail

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 103.

3. A minute account; a narrative or report of particulars: as, he gave a detail of all the transactions.

We spend the first five minutes in a detail of symptoms

Kane, Sec. Grinn. Exp., II, 93.

4. Milit., the selection of an individual or a body of troops for a particular service; the person or persons so selected; a detachment.

The force so organized will constitute the guard of the line from Duckport to Milliken's Bend. They will furnish all the guards and details required for general hospitals.

U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I, 470.

Details of a plan, in arch., drawings or delineations for the use of workmen. Otherwise called working-drawings—In detail. (a) Circumstantially; item by item.

I was unable to treat this part of my subject more in detail without becoming dry and tedious.

Pope.

(b) Individually, part by part.

"Concentrate your own force, divide that of your enemy, and overwhelm him in detail," is the great principle of military action.

Mardouffell, Modern Warfare, iii.

Office of detail, in the United States Navy Department, the office where the roster of officers is kept, and from which orders to officers regarding their duty, leaves of absence, etc., are issued.—Syn. 2. Relation, recital.—4. Squad.

detailed (dê-tâid'), p. a. [< detail + -ed.] 1. Related in particulars; minutely recited: as, a detailed account.—2. Exact; minute; particular.

A detailed examination.

Macaulay.

A detailed picture of the inhabitants of the largest Arab city.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, Pref., p. iv.

detailer (dê-tâi'ler), n. One who details.

Individually was sunk in the number of detailers.

Seaward, Letters, VI, 125.

detain (dê-tân'), v. t. [< OF. detenir, detener, F. detenir = Sp. detener (cf. Pg. deter) = It. detenere, < L. detinere, hold off, keep back, detain, < de-, off, + tenere, hold: see tenable, tenant. Cf. abstain, contain, obtain, pertain, retain, sustain, etc.] 1. To keep back or away; withhold; specifically, to keep or retain unjustly. [Rare.]

Detain not the wages of the hireling.

Jer. Taylor.

2. To keep or restrain from proceeding; stay or stop: as, we were detained by the rain.

Those thieves, which her in bondage strong

Spenser, F. Q., VI, xi, 2.

Let us detain thee, until we shall have made ready a kid for thee.

Judges xiii, 15.

Whole captive hosts the conqueror detains In painful bondage and inglorious chains.

Addison, The Campaign.

3. In law, to hold in custody.—Syn. 2. To retard, delay, hinder, check, retain.

detain (dê-tân'), n. [< detain, v.] Detention.

And gain enquire of him with mylde mood

The certain cause of Arlequins detain.

Spenser, F. Q., V, vi, 15.

detainer<sup>1</sup> (dê-tâi'ner), n. [< detain + -er, after OF. deteneur, detener, one who detains.] One who withholds; one who detains, stops, or prevents from proceeding.

The detainers of tithes, and cheaters of men's inheritance.

Jer. Taylor.

detainer<sup>2</sup> (dê-tâi'ner), n. [< OF. detener, inf. (used as a noun): see detain, v. Cf. retainer<sup>2</sup>.] In law: (a) A holding or keeping possession of what belongs to another; detention of what is another's, though the original taking may be lawful. It usually implies wrongfulness. (b) In Great Britain, a process lodged with the sheriff authorizing him to continue to hold a person already in his custody; specifically, a writ by which a prisoner arrested at the suit of one creditor may be detained at the suit of another.—Forfeible detainer. See forfeible.

detainment (dê-tân'ment), n. [< OF. detene-ment, < detener, detain: see detain and -ment.] The act of detaining; detention.

Concerning our surprise, detainment, and escape.

R. Knos (Archer's Eng. Garner, I, 234).

Though the original taking was lawful, any subsequent detainment of them after tender of amends is wrongful.

Blackstone.

Detarium (de-tâ-ri-um), n. [NL, < detar, the native name in Senegal.] A genus of leguminous trees of western Africa, of which only two species are known, D. Senegalense and D. microcarpum. The former is a tree from 30 to 35 feet high, bearing a somewhat oval, fleshy, one-seeded fruit about the size of an apricot, of which there are two varieties, the one bitter and the other sweet. The sweet fruit is sold in the markets, and prized by the negroes, as well as eagerly sought after by monkeys and other animals. The bitter fruit is regarded as a violent poison. The wood of the tree is hard, and resembles mahogany.

detaste (dê-tâst'), v. t. [Var. of distaste.] To distaste; dislike; loathe.

detect (dê-tek't'), v. t. [< L. detectus, pp. of detegere, uncover, expose, < de-, priv. + tegere, cover: see tegument, tile, thatch.] 1. To uncover; lay bare; expose; show.

Sham'st thou not . . . To let thy tongue detect thy base-born heart?

Shak., 3 Hen VI, II, 2.

There's no true lover in the forest, else sighing every minute and groaning every hour would detect the lax foot of time as well as a clock.

Shak., As you Like it, III, 2.

Be sure, thou nothing of the Truth detect

Congreve, Hymn to Venus.

Where the divine virtue . . . is not felt in the soul, and waited for, and lived in, imperfections will quickly break out, and shew themselves, and detect the unfaithfulness of such persons.

Penn., Rise and Progress of Quakers, vi.

2. To discover; find out; ascertain the existence, presence, or fact of: as, to detect an error in an account; to detect the presence of arsenic.

Though, should I hold my peace, yet thou Wouldest easily detect what I conceal.

Milton, P. L., I, 126.

Like following life through creatures you dissect, You lose it in the moment you detect.

Pope, Moral Essays, I, 30.

A good ear detects several gradations between tones which to a bad ear seem alike.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 92.

Look in his face to meet thy neighbor's soul, Not on his garments, to detect a hole.

O. W. Holmes, A Rhymed Lesson.

3. To find out the action or character of; discover a fault or wrong in; unveil, as a person: as, to detect a man in the act of cheating; to detect a hypocrite.

I will prevent this, detect my wife, be revenged on Falstaff.

Shak., M. W. of W., II, 2.

4. To reveal the guilt or alleged guilt of; inform against; complain of; accuse.

He was vntuly judged to have preached such articles as he was detected of.

Sir F. More, Works, p. 112.

But hast thou not betray'd me, Foolish? Hast thou not detected me to that faithless Mirabell?

Congreve, Way of the World, III, 2.

—Syn. 2. To find, ascertain, decry, make out, ferret out, penetrate.

detectable, detectible (dê-tek'ta-bl, -ti-bl), a. [< detect + -able, -ible.] That may be detected.

Parties not detectable.

Fuller.

These errors are detectible at a glance.

Latham.

It is . . . pretty well established . . . that in some of the minutest details of the lunar topography there are real changes in progress, detectable by just such observation (microscopic).

New Princeton Rev., I, 57.

detected (dê-tek'ted), a. [< detect, v., 1, + -ed.] In entom., uncovered; applied to the hemelytra of heteropterous Hemiptera when, as in most species, they are not covered by the scutellum: opposed to obscured.

detector (dê-tek'ter), n. See detector.

detectable, a. See detectable.

detection (dē-tēk'shən), n. [L.L. detectio (n.), a revealing, < L. detectare, pp. detectus, uncover, reveal: see detect.] 1. Discovery; finding by search or observation.

Americus Vespulius, a Florentine, who, in the year 1497, made a further detection of the more southern regions in this continent. C. Mather, Mag. Chris., i. 1.

The sea and rivers are instrumental to the detection of amber and other fossils, by washing away the earth that concealed them. Woodward.

2. The act of detecting, finding out, or bringing to light; a discerning; the state or fact of being detected or found out: as, the detection of faults, crimes, or criminals.

detective (dē-tēk'tiv), a. and n. [detect + -ive.] 1. a. 1. Fitted for or skilled in detecting; employed in detecting: as, the detective police.—2. Relating to detectives or to detection: as, a detective story.—Detective agency or bureau. See private detective, under IL.—Detective camera. See cameras.

II. n. A person whose occupation it is to discover matters as to which information is desired, particularly concerning wrong-doers, and to obtain evidence to be used against them. His duties differ from those of the ordinary policeman in that he has no specific beat or round, and in that he is concerned with the investigation of specific cases, or the watching of particular individuals or classes of offenders, rather than with the general guardianship of the peace, and does not wear a distinguishing uniform.

For once the police were not charged with stupidity, nor were the detectives blamed for inability to construct bricks without straw. Saturday Rev., April 29, 1895.

Private detective, a person engaged unofficially in obtaining secret information for or guarding the private interests of those who employ him. In large cities private detectives are often organized in considerable numbers, under a head or chief, in what are called detective agencies or bureaus.

detector (dē-tēk'tor), n. [Also detector; < L.L. detector, a revealer, < L. detectare, pp. detectus, uncover, reveal: see detect.] 1. One who or that which detects or brings to light; one who finds out what another attempts to conceal; a revealer; a discoverer.

A death-bed is a detector of the heart. Young, Night Thoughts, II. 361.

2. An instrument or a device for indicating the presence or state of a thing. Specifically—(a) An arrangement of the parts of a lock by which any attempt to tamper with it is frustrated and indicated. (b) A low-water indicator for boilers. (c) A form of galvanometer, generally small and convenient for transportation, which indicates the passage of a current of electricity, showing its direction but not its strength. Also called galvanoscope. (d) An instrument for detecting the presence of forgeries in an enemy's harbor. Bank-note detector, in the United States, a periodical publication containing a description of all bank-notes in circulation, and a statement of the standing of the banks represented by them, to facilitate the detection of forged, worthless, or depreciated notes. The public need of such an aid has greatly diminished since the control of paper currency was transferred from the States to the national government in 1864. See National Bank Act, under bank.

Sometimes written detektor.

detector-lock (dē-tēk'tor-lok), n. A lock fitted with a device for indicating any attempt to pick or force it open.

denigrate (dē-tēn'grāt), v. t. [L. denigrare, to make dark, < denigrare, pp. of tenebrare, make dark, < tenebra, darkness: see tenebra.] To remove darkness from.

detent (dē-tēnt'), n. [L.L. detentus, a holding back, < L. detinere, pp. detentus, hold back: see detain.] Anything used to check or prevent motion or approach; a catch; specifically, a pin, stud, or lever forming a check in a clock, watch, tumbler-lock, or other machine. The detent in a clock falls into the striking-wheel and stops it when the right number of strokes have been given. The detent of a ratchet-wheel prevents backward motion.

detection (dē-tēn'shən), n. [F. détention = Fr. detention = Sp. detención = Pg. detenção = It. detenzione, < L. as if **detentio* (n.), < detinere, pp. detentus, detain: see detain.] 1. The act of detaining or keeping back; a withholding or keeping of what belongs to or is claimed by another.

How goes the world that I am thus encounter'd With clamorous demands of debt-broken bonds, And the detection of long-since-due debts, Against my honour? Shak., T. of A., II. 2.

2. The state of being detained or held back; restraint; confinement.

This worketh by detection of the spirits, and constipation of the tangible parts. Bacon.

Nothing could assure the quiet of both realms . . . but their detection under safe custody. Spencer, Church of Scotland, an. 1570.

Except for political offenses, the old prisons were principally employed as places of detection before trial. Reverett, Orations, II. 129.

3. Forced stoppage; hindrance; delay from necessity or on account of obstacles.—Reason of detection, a place where offenders (and sometimes witnesses) are detained while awaiting trial; a lock-up.

detentive (dē-tēn'tiv), a. [L. detentus, pp. of detinere, detain (see detent), + -ive.] Used in detaining, as intruding insects; seizing and holding.

The detentive surface [of the pitcher in Nepenthes] is represented by the fluid secretion which is invariably present. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 126.

detent-joint (dē-tēnt'joint), n. In ichth., the joint by which the pectoral spine of a siluriform fish is kept erect or pointed from the side.

deter (dē-tēr'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deterred, ppr. detering. [OF. deterrer, < L. deterrere, frighten from, prevent, < de, from, + terrere, frighten: see terrible, terrify, terror.] To discourage and stop by fear; hence, to stop or prevent from acting or proceeding by any countervailing motive: as, we are often deterred from our duty by trivial difficulties; the state of the road or a cloudy sky may deter a man from undertaking a journey.

Unto laws that men do make for the benefit of men it hath seemed alway needful to add rewards which may more allure unto good than any hardness deterret from it. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 10.

Dragons and serpents were seen in the most hideous attitudes, to deter the spectator from approaching. Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxxi.

A million of frustrated hopes will not deter us from new experiments. J. M. Mason.

—Syn. To hinder, restrain, keep back.

deterge (dē-tērj'), v. t.; pret. and pp. deterged, ppr. deterging. [F. déterger = Pg. detergir = It. detergere, < L. detergere, wipe off, < de, off, + tergere, pp. terens, wipe, scour: see terse.] To cleanse; clear away foul or offensive matter from, as from the body or from a wound or ulcer.

detergence, detergency (dē-tēr'jen-s, -jen-si), n. [detergen (t) + -ce, -cy.] The quality of being detergent; cleansing or purging power.

Bath water . . . possesses that milkiness, detergency, and muddling heat so friendly adapted to weakened animal constitutions. Delee, Tour through Great Britain, II. 220.

detergent (dē-tēr'jent), a. and n. [F. détergent = Sp. Pg. It. detergente, < L. detergen (t) = ppr. of detergere: see deterge.] 1. a. Cleansing; purging.

The food ought to be nourishing and detergent. Arbutnot.

II. n. Anything that cleanses.

The virtues of the most valuable preparation, I mean salt of amber, are in a great degree answered by tar-water as a detergent. By. Berkeley, Ser., § 23.

detergible (dē-tēr'ji-bl), a. [deterge + -ible.] Capable of being removed by any cleansing process.

deteriorate (dē-tē-ri-ō-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. deteriorated, ppr. deteriorating. [L.L. deterioratus, pp. of deteriorare (> It. deteriorare = Sp. Pg. Fr. détériorer = F. détériorer), make worse, < deterior, worse, comp. of **detr*, lit. lower, inferior, comp. of de, down: see de, and of exterior, interior, inferior, etc.] 1. trans. To make worse; reduce in quality; lower the essential character or constitution of: as, to deteriorate a race of men or their condition.

At the expense of impairing the philosophical powers, and, on the whole, deteriorating the mind. Whately, Rhetoric, Int.

He knew that the sham Empire had deteriorated the once pulsant French army into nearly as great a sham as itself. Arr., Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 51.

II. intrans. To grow worse; be or become impaired in quality; degenerate.

Under such conditions the mind rapidly deteriorates. Goldsmith, Emans.

deteriorated (dē-tē-ri-ō-rāt-ed), p. a. [deteriorate + -ed.] Of degenerate character or quality; reduced to an inferior condition: as, deteriorated bioplasm.

deterioration (dē-tē-ri-ō-rā'shən), n. [F. détérioration = Sp. deterioración = Pg. deterioração = It. deteriorazione, < ML. deterioratio (n.), < L.L. deteriorare, make worse: see deteriorate.] A growing or making worse; the state of growing worse.

Although . . . in a strictly mechanical sense, there is a conservation of energy, yet, as regards usefulness or fitness for living beings, the energy of the universe is in process of deterioration. W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature, p. 57.

The moral deterioration attendant on a false and shallow life. Hawthorne, Ethelred Romance, xii.

—Syn. Degeneracy, debasement, degradation, depravation.

deteriorative (dē-tē-ri-ō-rā-tiv), a. [deteriorate + -ive.] Causing or tending to deteriorate.

The Deteriorative Power of Conventional Art over Nations. The Athenaeum, No. 2186, p. 462.

deteriority (dē-tē-ri-ō-rī-ti), n. [L. as if **deterioritas* (-is), < deterior, worse: see deteriorate.] Worse state or quality. [Rare.]

I have shown that this diminution of age is to be attributed not to the change of the temperature of the air as to salubrity or equality, or due to the deteriority of the diet, or to both these causes. Ray, Disc. of the World, III.

determ, v. t. [ME. determen, short for determinen, determine: see determine, and cf. term.] To determine.

Lymmitt & ordinit be the three estates in parliament to determen all causes in the said parliament. Act. Audit, A. 1429, p. 145 (Jamieson).

Nocht on held, without detourment, Determen withoutin Just cognition. Lander, Dewtie of Kyngh (E. E. T. S.), i. 424.

determa (dē-tēr'mā), n. A native wood of Guiana, used for masts, booms, and as planking for vessels. It is avoided by insects.

determent (dē-tēr'ment), n. [deter + -ment.] The act of deterring, or the state of being deterred; a cause of hindrance; that which deters.

Nor will the ill success of some be made a sufficient determent unto others. Str. T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

These are not all the determents that opposed my obeying you. Dryden.

determinability (dē-tēr'mi-nā-bil'i-ti), n. [determinable: see -ability.] The quality of being determinable.

determinable (dē-tēr'mi-nā-bl), a. [ME. determinuab, < OF. determinable, F. déterminable = Sp. determinable, < L.L. determinabilis, that has an end, < L. determinare, limit, determine: see determine.] 1. Capable of being determined, fixed, or ascertained with certainty; able to be clearly defined or decided upon: as, a determinable quantity; the meaning of Plato's expression is not determinable.

In sauter [palter] is sayd a verbe oerte That spekes a poyt ut determinuab. Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 528.

The point now before us is not wholly determinable from the bare grammatical use of the words. South, Sermons, IV. vi.

Social change is facile in proportion as men's places and functions are determinable by personal qualities. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 445.

2. In law: (a) Subject to premature termination: as, a lease determinable at the option of the lessor. (b) Liable to be terminated by a contingency yet uncertain or unknown: as, a determinable fee. Thus, a devise being made to A but in case he should die without leaving issue, then to B, the estate in A during his life is a fee because it may be forever, but is determinable by reason of the contingent limitation. See fee.

The quality of being determinable. [Rare.]

determinacy (dē-tēr'mi-nā-si), n. [determina (le) + -cy.] Determinateness. [Rare.]

The ear solves its problem with the greatest exactness, certainty, and determinacy. Helmholtz, Pop. Sci. Lect. (trans.), p. 80.

determinance (dē-tēr'mi-nāns), n. [OF. determinancia, < ML. determinantia, an order, decree, ordinance, conclusion, < L. determinan (t), ppr. of determinare, determine: see determine, determinant.] In old universities, the degree or grade of bachelor of arts. See determination, 12.

determinant (dē-tēr'mi-nant), a. and n. [F. déterminant = Sp. Pg. It. determinante, < L. determinan (t), ppr. of determinare, determine: see determine.] 1. a. Serving to determine; determinative. Coleridge.

II. n. 1. That which determines, fixes, defines, or establishes something.

However variable the visible antecedents may be, the real determinants—the co-operant factors—are in each case invariant. G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. vi. § 23.

2. In old universities, one who, having taken the lowest degree in arts, had been admitted to act as chief respondent in the Lenten disputations. See determination, 12.

Two years later, in due course of his academical studies, this Guillemus Lander appears among the determinants in that College (St. Leonard's, in St. Andrews University); which shows that he had qualified himself for taking his Master's degree. Lander, Dewtie of Kyngh (E. E. T. S.), Pref., vi.

3. In math., the sum of all the products which can be formed of a square block of quantities, each product containing as a factor one number from each row and one from each column of the block, and each product being affected by the plus or minus sign according as the arrangement of rows from which its factors are taken (these factors being arranged in the order of the columns from which they are taken) requires an even or an odd number of transpositions to reduce it to the arrangement in the square. A determinant is conventionally denoted by writing the square block of quantities between two vertical lines. For example,

$$\begin{vmatrix} A & B \\ a & b \end{vmatrix} =$$

$$AB - aB$$

$$\begin{vmatrix} A & B & C \\ a & b & c \\ \alpha & \beta & \gamma \end{vmatrix} =$$

$$Aby - A\beta c + a\beta C - a\beta C + a\beta C - a\beta C$$

The different products of which a determinant is the sum are called its elements. The different quantities which are multiplied to form the elements are called the constituents of the determinant. The oblique line of places from the upper left-hand to the lower right-hand corner is called the principal diagonal. The conjugate line of places is called the secondary diagonal. The square root of the number of constituents is the ordinal number of the order or degree of the determinant. A symmetric determinant, one each of whose elements is the cofactor of the corresponding term of the determinant to which it is adjacent. — Asymmetric determinant. Same as symmetric determinant. See below. — Bialar determinant. See bialar. — Bordered determinant, a determinant whose matrix is formed from another by adding new rows and columns, especially where a single row and column are added, with a zero at their intersection. — Centrosymmetric determinant, one which is symmetric with respect to both diagonals. — Characteristic determinant of a matrix, the determinant of a matrix formed from the given matrix by adding the same indeterminate quantity to each constituent of the principal diagonal. — Complementary determinant, a determinant related to a partial determinant, to which it is said to be complementary, by having for its constituents all the constituents of the total determinant which belong to rows and columns from neither of which any constituent of the partial determinant has been taken, the sign of the complementary determinant being determined by taking its matrix as it stands in the lower right-hand corner of the matrix of the total determinant, when the matrix of the partial determinant has been brought to the upper left-hand corner, without altering the value of the total determinant. — Composite determinant, a sum of determinants whose matrices are obtained by successively omitting all the different combinations of  $m$ -columns from a rectangular block of quantities having  $m$ -rows and  $n$ -columns. The composite determinant is usually denoted by writing its oblong matrix with two vertical lines on each side. — Compound determinant, a determinant whose constituents are themselves determinants. — Cubic determinant, a quantity formed on the analogy of a determinant proper from a cube of quantities as constituents. — Cyclic determinant. Same as circular. — Determinant of a linear transformation or substitution, the determinant whose constituents are the coefficients of the equations of transformation regularly arrayed. — Functional determinant, one in which all the constituents in each row are differential coefficients of one quantity, while all the constituents in each column are differential coefficients with respect to one variable. — Gauche determinant. Same as skew determinant. See below. — Minor determinant, or minor of a determinant, a determinant whose matrix is formed from the matrix of another determinant by erasing part of the rows and columns. First minor, a minor formed by erasing one row and one column; second minor, a minor formed by erasing two rows and two columns, etc. —  $N$ -dimensional determinant of the  $n$ th order, a function of  $n$ th constituents, analogous to an ordinary determinant. — Ortho-symmetric determinant, one all the constituents of which, having the sum of the ordinal places of the row and column the same, are equal. — Partial determinant. Same as minor determinant. — Perisymmetric determinant, one which is symmetrical with reference to both diagonals. — Reciprocal determinant, a determinant each constituent of which is the corresponding first minor of the determinant of which it is the reciprocal. — Skew determinant, one in which every constituent of the  $m$ th row and  $n$ th column is in every case the negative of the one in the  $n$ th row and  $m$ th column, except on the principal diagonal. Also called gauche determinant. — Skew symmetric determinant, a skew determinant in which all the constituents of the principal diagonal vanish. — Symmetric determinant, one in which the constituent in the  $m$ th row and  $n$ th column is in every case equal to that in the  $n$ th row and  $m$ th column. — Zero-determinant, one in which the constituents of the principal diagonal are all zero. [The name determinant in a narrower sense was introduced by Gauss, and was first applied in the present sense by Cauchy.]

determinantal (dĕ-tĕr-mi-nan-tl), a. [< determinant + -al.] In math., or of pertaining to determinants.

The existence of a notation for the elements of a determinantal product and a knowledge of the properties of the elements facilitate very much the investigation of the laws of repeated determinantal multiplication.
T. Muir, Bipartite Functions, Trans. Royal Soc. of Edin., [XXXX 478.]

determinate (dĕ-tĕr-mi-nāt), v. t. [< L. determinatus, pp. of determinare, limit, fix, determine: see determine.] To bring to an end; terminate.

The slow hours shall not determine
The dateless limit of thy dear exile.

Shak., Rich. II., l. 2.

determinate (dĕ-tĕr-mi-nāt), a. [< ME. determinat = F. déterminé = Sp. Pg. determinado = It. determinato, < L. determinatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Having defined limits; fixed; def-nite; clearly defined or definable; particular: as, a determinate quantity of matter.

A determinate number of feet.

Dryden, Essay on Dram. Poetry.

He talks of power, for example, as if the meaning of the word power were as determinate as the meaning of the word circle.

Macaulay, Utilitarian Theory of Government.

2. Predetermined; settled; positive: as, a determinate rule or order.

Being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. Acts II. 23.

3. Decisive; conclusive.

I the progress of this business,

Ere a determinate resolution, he

(I mean the bishop) did require a respite.

Shak., Hen. VIII., II. 4.

4. Determined upon; intended.

My determinate voyage is mere extravagancy.

Shak., T. N., II. 1.

5. Fixed in purpose; resolute; determined.

Like men doused in a long peace; more determinate to do, than skilful how to do.

Shir. P. Sidney.

There are some curiosities so bold and determinate as to tell the very matter of her prayer.

Jar. Taylor, Works (ed. 1836), I. 29.

Determinate idea, an idea not vague, but distinguished from every other. — Determinate individual, in logic, a particular individual, designated by name or otherwise, distinguished from others. — Determinate infirmness, in bot., same as centrifugal infirmness (which see, under centrifugal). — Determinative judgment (Gr. apophansis), a proposition whose subject is a demonstrative pronoun: a term of Rhetoric logic. — Determinative problem, in geom. and analysis, a problem which admits of one solution only, or at least a certain and finite number of solutions: being thus opposed to an indeterminate problem, which admits of an infinite number of solutions. determinately (dĕ-tĕr-mi-nāt-ly), adv. 1. With certainty; precisely; in a definite manner.

The principles of religion are . . . determinately true or false.

Tillotson.

I have inquired much about Dr. Mead, but can't tell you anything determinately.

Walpole, Letters, II. 226.

We perceive the distance of visible objects more exactly and determinately with two eyes than one.

Reid, Enquiry, VI. § 22.

2. Resolutely; with fixed resolve.

Determinately bent that she would seek all loving means to win Zellman.

Shir. P. Sidney, Arcadia.

Before the Reformation, not only were early marriages determinately discouraged, but the opportunities for them did not exist.

Freid., Sketches, p. 139.

determinateness (dĕ-tĕr-mi-nāt-ness), n. 1. The state of being determinate, certain, or precise.

On the whole, the variations in the object pursued as good . . . have consisted in its acquisition of greater fullness and determinateness.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 257.

2. The quality of being determined or of preserving fixedness of purpose; determination.

His determinateness and his power seemed to make allies unnecessary.

Jane Austen, Mansfield Park, xiv.

determination (dĕ-tĕr-mi-nā'shon), n. [< ME. determinacion = OF. déterminacion, determinacion, F. détermination = Sp. determinacion = Pg. determinação = It. determinazione, < L. determinatio(-n-), boundary, conclusion, end, < determinare, pp. determinatus, bound, determine: see determine.] 1. An ending; a putting an end to; termination: as, the determination of an estate.

The kynge, by thadvise of his counsell and consent of the parties, makethe a fynall end and determination.

English Glōse (E. E. T. S.), p. 206.

And of the great appearance there was of a speedy determination of that war.

Ludlow, Memoirs, I. 239.

2. Delimitation; the act of setting bounds to or of determining the limits of; specifically, assignment to the proper place in a classification or series.

The particular determination of the reward or punishment belonged unto them by whom laws are made.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, I. § 10.

3. A determining or deciding, as after consideration or examination; specifically, definite or authoritative judicial settlement, as of a controversy or suit.

It may be a question who shall have the determination of such controversies as may arise whether this or that action or speech be decent or indecent.

Puttenham, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 230.

4. A decision arrived at or promulgated; an authoritative or final ruling; a determinate opinion or conclusion.

His [the Muti's] authority is so esteemed that the Emperor will never alter a determination made by him.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 512.

I have this hour received a despatch from our resident with the determination of the republic on that point.

Stowe, Tristram Shandy, IV. 21.

5. The mental act of deciding or resolving; the fixing or settling of a mental purpose; the act of resolve.

For in every voluntary determination there are certainly two elements: the consciousness of an energy or effort, and a distinct feeling of satisfaction in making the effort.

Meadley, Body and Will, p. 87.

What I affirm is that you have a power of determining to act, a power of freely forming the internal act of determination to do something.

Nicciot, Nature and Thought, p. 212.

6. A state of mental decision or resolution with regard to something; determined purpose; fixed intention: as, determination to succeed in an enterprise; his determination was inflexible.

On the part of the people it [the moral sense] gives rise to what we call a jealousy of their liberties — a watchful determination to resist anything like encroachment upon their rights.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 368.

7. The quality of being determined; fixedness of purpose; decision of character; resoluteness: as, a man of determination.

Violent impulses is not the same as a firm determination.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 177.

8. In old med., the turning or determining point; the crisis.

He carefully noted the determination of these maladies.

Shew, tr. of Sydenham.

9. Tendency or direction. (a) Of the intellect or will toward some object or end by an antecedent mental state (idea or motive), determination being in the mental what causation is in the physical world.

Examination is consulting a guide. The determination of the will, upon inquiry, is following the direction of that guide.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. 50.

(b) Of the blood: abnormal afflux or flow: as, determination of blood to the head.

10. The solution of a problem, mathematical or other; an ascertainment of any magnitude or the value of any quantity; especially, a scientific evaluation based upon exact physical measurements: as, a determination of the length of the seconds-pendulum. — 11. In logic: (a) The process of adding characters to a notion, and thus rendering it more definite, whether this is done by limiting its scope or by an increase of information.

This notion, in which ego and non-ego are thought as mutually determining, is called by Fichte the category of reciprocal determination (Wechselbestimmung).

Adamson, Fichte, p. 168.

In the most complete determination within our reach, the conception still does not suffice to enable any one to say positively what the perfection of his life would be.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 270.

(b) The differentiating character itself that is added in this process.

The different determinations of a substance, which are nothing but particular modes in which it exists, are called accidents.

Kant, tr. by Max Müller.

12. [ML. determinatio questionis, the answering a question, the posing of theses to be defended.] In Oxford and other old universities: (a) A solemn disputation in which the respondent is a bachelor of arts, and which is preparatory to graduation as master of arts. (b) A disputation or other act substituted in recent times for the old disputation. The determinations were kept in Lent, and hence often called the Lent determinations. Originally, in the University of Paris (the model of most of the old universities of northern Europe, and especially of Oxford and Cambridge), there was but one degree, that of master of arts, carrying with it the right to lecture regularly in the university. The purpose of the determinations was to enable the masters to judge whether the candidate was fit to be presented to the chancellor as candidate for the mastership; and since there were no examinations, there was no other regular means of ascertaining the candidate's fitness. The baccalaureate was at first called the determinatio, and was originally not a degree, nor conferred by the university, but merely a permission to determine or act as chief respondent in the Lent disputations, and was conferred by the "nation." In consequence of this inseparable connection between the baccalaureate and the determinations, the latter are often considered as conditions of the former, although they follow in time.

Hence — 13. A discussion of a question according to the scholastic method, after the model of a disputation.

Another diversity of Method, which is likewise of great weight, is the handling of knowledge by . . . Questions and their Determinations, the latter kind whereof, if it be immediately followed, is as prejudicial to the proceeding of learning as it is to the proceeding of an army to go about to besiege every little fort or hold.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

He [Wyclif] broached some singular opinions on several abstruse points of metaphysics, which led to determinations or treatises being published against him.

Mayo, Brit., VIII. 411.

— Sp. 2. Conclusion, settlement, termination. — T. Resignation, etc. (see decision), firmness.

determinative (dĕ-tĕr-mi-nāt-iv), a. and n. [*= OF. determinativus, F. déterminatif = Sp. Pg. It. determinativo, < L. as if *determinativus, < de-* terminatus, pp. of determinare, determine: see determine.] I. a. 1. Having power to determine, fix, or decide; tending or serving to shape or direct; conclusive.

The determinative power of a just cause.

Alp. Bramhall, Against Hobbes.

Incidents . . . determinative of their course. I. Taylor.

2. Of use in ascertaining the species; serving to determine the precise kind of a thing; as, determinative tables in the natural sciences (that is, tables arranged for determining the specific character of minerals, plants, etc., and to assist in assigning them to their species); determinative signs in hieroglyphics; determinative ornaments or structures.

If the term added to make up the complex subject does not necessarily or constantly belong to it, then it is determinative, and limits the subject to a particular part of its extension: as, Every pious man shall be happy.

Watts, Logic, II. 2.

Determinative judgment, in logic, a definitive judgment; one in which something is held as true: opposed to problematic or interrogative judgment.

II. n. That which determines or indicates the character or quality of something else. Specifically—(a) In hieroglyphics, an ideographic sign annexed to a word expressed by a phonetic sign, for the purpose of defining its signification. Thus, the conventional figure of a tree in the Egyptian hieroglyphics is determinative of the general idea tree, the particular kind of tree being expressed by the phonetic sign preceding it.

For instance, the picture of a man squatting down is used as the generic determinative for the proper names of persons, for pronouns, and participles.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 60.

(b) In gram., a determinative or demonstrative word.

determinato (dā-ter-mē-nā'tō), adv. [It., determinato, pp. of determinare, < L. determinare, determine: see determine, a., and determine.] In music, with resolution or firmness.

determinator (dā-ter-mī-nā'tor), n. [= OF. determinator, determinator, also determinator = It. determinatore, < L.L. determinator, < L. determinare, pp. determinatus, determine: see determine.] One who determines or decides; an arbitrator. [Rare.]

Choose them an author out of all protestant divines, whom they would make umpire and determinator between us and them. Ep. Morton, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 29.

determine (dā-ter'min), v.; pret. and pp. determined, ppr. determining. [< ME. determinen, < OF. determiner, F. determiner = *Pr. To fix the bounds of; mark off; settle; fix; establish.

[God] hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. Acts xvii. 26.

2. To limit in space or extent; form the limits of; bound; shut in: as, yonder hill determines our view.

The knowledge of man hitherto hath been determined by the view or sight. Bacon.

3. To ascertain or state definitely; make out; find out; settle; decide upon, as after consideration or investigation: as, to determine the species of an animal or a plant; to determine the height of a mountain, or the quantity of nitrogen in the atmosphere.

New Holland is a very large tract of Land. It is not yet determined whether it is an island or a main Continent. Dampier, Voyages, I. 403.

It would be presumption to attempt to determine the employments of that eternal life which good men are to pass in God's presence.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 4.

Here be facts, character; what they spell Determine, and thence pick what sense you may!

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 124.

4. In logic, to explain or limit by adding differences.—5. To bring to a conclusion; put an end to; end.

Death determineth the manifold incommensurabilities and painfulness of this wretchedness of this life.

Sir T. More, Life of Pico, in Utopia, Int., p. lxxx.

Those . . . would flourish but a short period of time, and be out of vogue when that was determined.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, III. 2.

An act of the will whereby an estate at will is determined or put an end to.

Blackstone, Com., II. 146.

Specifically—6. To find, as the solution of a problem; end, as a dispute, by judicial or other final decision: as, the court determined the cause.

They still beseege him, being ambitious only To come to blows, and let their swords determine Who hath the better cause.

Fletcher (and another), False One, I. 1.

Milton's subject . . . does not determine the fate of single persons or nations, but of a whole species. Addison.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lect., p. 216.

8. To come to a definite intention in respect of; resolve on; decide: as, he determined to remain.

Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus. Acts xx. 16.

The surest way not to fail is to determine to succeed.

Sherridan.

Murder was determined, dared and done.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 183.

9. To give direction or tendency to; decide the course of: as, impulse may determine a moving body to this or that point.

In the tale of Melibæus his [Chaucer's] inimitable faculty of story-telling comes to his aid, and determines his sentences to a little more variety and picturesque.

S. Lister, The English Novel, p. 10.

Let celestial aspects admonish and advertise, not conclude and determine thy way.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., III. 7.

Uneasiness is the great motive that works on the mind to put it upon action, which for shortness' sake we will call determining of the will.

Locke.

10. To influence the choice of; cause to come to a conclusion or resolution: as, this circumstance determined him to the study of law.

Clara Clairmont . . . took credit to herself for having determined Shelley to travel abroad.

E. Dowden, Shelley, II. 7.

—Syn. 2. To limit.—3. To ascertain, find out.—4. To decide, conclude.—10. To induce, influence, lead.

II. intrans. 1. To come to a decision or resolution; settle definitively on some line of conduct.

Bind 'em fast: when fury hath given way to reason, I will determine of their sufferings, Which shall be horrid.

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, III. 1.

If you have laid my papers and books by, I pray let this messenger have them; I have determined upon them.

Doane, Letters, xliii.

2. To come to a close; end; terminate.

Rather deye I wolde and determine.

Chaucer, Troilus, III. 579.

3. To come to a determinate end in time; reach a fixed or definite limit; cease to exist or to be in force.

Some estates may determine on future contingencies.

Blackstone.

The power of a magistrate was supposed to determine only by his own resignation. J. Adams, Works, IV. 330.

The Parliament, according to law, determined in six months after the decease of the sovereign.

Locky, Eng. in 18th Cent., I.

The tax [on sugar] was not imposed without considerable opposition from the merchants, and, granted for eight years only, determined in 1692.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, IV. 23.

determined (dā-ter'mind), p. a. [Pp. of determine, v.] 1. Limited; restricted; confined within bounds; circumscribed.

His power is determined, he may terrify us, but not hurt.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 619.

2. Definite; determinate; precisely marked.

The person of a noun singular is determined or undetermined. J. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 2.

Those many shadows lay in spots determined and unmoved.

Wordsworth.

3. Characterized by or showing determination or fixed purpose; resolute: as, a determined man; a determined countenance; a determined effort.—4. Unflinching; unflinching; unwavering.

Strictly speaking, it is only Sparta and Athens that can be regarded as determined enemies to the Persians.

Von Arnab, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 171.

—Syn. 2 and 4. Firm, inflexible, staunch, steadfast.

determinedly (dā-ter'mind-lī), adv. In a determined manner; with determination; unwaveringly.

He [the Highlander] is courteous, diffident, determinedly persevering, unflinching as a fox, unwearied as a friend.

Guthrie, Geol. Sketches, II. 60.

determiner (dā-ter'mī-nēr), n. 1. One who decides or determines.

No man or body of men in these times can be the infallible judges or determiners in matters of religion to any other men's consciences but their own. Addison, Civil Power.

One might as well hope to dissect one's own body and be merry in doing it, as to take molecular physics . . . to be your dominant guide, your determiner of motives, in what is solely human. George Eliot, in Crusoe, III. xvii.

2. A determinant bachelor in a university.

See determinant, 2.

determining (dā-ter'mī-nīng), n. [Verbal n. of determine, v.] In medieval universities, the act of qualifying for a degree by keeping the act.

See act, 5.

determining (dā-ter'mī-nīng), p. a. [Ppr. of determine, v.] Having the power of fixing; directing, regulating, or controlling: as, determining influences or conditions.

determinism (dā-ter'mī-nizm), n. [< determine + -ism.] 1. A term invented by Sir William Hamilton to denote the doctrine of the necessitarian philosophers, who hold that man's actions are uniformly determined by motives acting upon his character, and that he has not the power to choose to act in one way so long as he prefers on the whole to act in another way. Determinism does not imply materialism, atheism, or a denial of moral responsibility; while it is in direct opposition to fatalism and to the doctrine of the freedom of the will.

If man is only a sample of the universal determinism, yet forms purposes, contrives for their accomplishment, and executes them, definite causality and prospective thought can work together, and the field which is occupied by the one is not preoccupied against the other.

J. Martineau, Materialism, p. 196.

2. In general, the doctrine that whatever is or happens is entirely determined by antecedent causes; the doctrine that the science of phenomena consists in connecting them with the antecedent conditions of their existence.

Such knowledge as we are capable of obtaining is strictly limited to what Claude Bernard calls the determinism of phenomena; that is to say, we can know only under what determining conditions events capable of recognition through our senses or through consciousness take place.

determinist (dā-ter'mī-nist), n. and a. [< determine + -ist.] I. n. One who supports or favors determinism.

He [man] knows how he himself, though conscious of self-disposal as well as of subjection of nature, presents to the determinist the aspect of a machine.

J. Martineau, Materialism, p. 196.

II. a. Relating to the doctrine of determinism.

It seems to me that the root of the Positivists' scorn for theology is the determinist doctrine which, in spite of all the evidence of the ages, denies the possibility, and of course therefore the reality, of sin.

Contemporary Rev., II. 492.

deterministic (dā-ter'mī-nis'tik), a. [< determinist + -ic.] Pertaining to or imbued with the philosophy of determinism.

The deterministic doctrine would stand on just as firm a foundation as it does if there were no physical science.

Huxley, Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XI. 901.

determination (dā-ter'mī-nā'shon), n. [< L. as if **determinatio* (n.), < **determinare* (> OF. determiner, F. determiner, dig up), < de, from, + terra, earth.] The uncovering of anything which is buried or covered with earth; an unearthing. [Rare.]

= Syn. Abhor, Detest etc. (see hate); to execrate, view with horror.

detestability (dê-têst-ə-bil'i-ti), n. [= OF. detestabilite: as detestabile + -ity: see -bilit.] The state or quality of being detestable; detestableness.

Nevertheless it is plausibly argued that, as young ladies (Machben) are, to mankind, precisely the most delightful in those visits, so young gentlemen (Bubchen) do then attain their maximum of detestability.

Carpile, Martor Resartus, p. 38.

detestable (dê-têst-ə-bl), a. [OF. detestable, F. detestable = Sp. detestable = Pg. detestavel = It. detestabile, L. detestabilis, execrable, abominable, < detestari, execrate, abominate, detest: see detest.] To be detested; hateful; abominable; execrable; very odious.

Thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things.
Ezek v. 11.

Bad affairs and extortion always overtake you in this detestable country, at the very time when you are about to leave it.
Bacon, Source of the Nile, l. 48.

detestableness (dê-têst-ə-bl-ness), n. The quality of being detestable; extreme hatefulness.

It is then intrinsic hatefulness and detestableness which originally inflames us against them.
Adam Smith, Moral Sentiments, II. § 2.

detestably (dê-têst-ə-bl-ly), adv. In a detestable manner; very hatefully; abominably; execrably.

A tempest of mind rendering men so detestably bad, that the great enemy of mankind neither can nor desires to make them worse.
South.

detestant (dê-têst-ənt), n. [L. detestant (-t), pp. of detestari, detest: see detest.] Same as detester. [Itare.]

You know not what to term them, unless detestants of the Komish idolatry.
By Hooker, Abp. Williams, l. 121.

detestation (dê-têst-ə-shən), r. t. [L. detestatus, pp. of detestari: see detest.] To detest.

Which, as a mortal enemy, the doctrine of the Gospel doeth detestate & abhorre.
J. Uddall, On John, Pref.

detestation (dê-têst-ə'shən), n. [F. detestation = Fr. detestation = Sp. detestacion = Pg. detestação = It. detestazione, L. detestatio (-n), < detestari, pp. detestatus, detest: see detest.] Extreme dislike; hatred; abhorrence; loathing: with of.

In how different a degree of detestation numbers of wicked actions stand there, thou equally bad and vicious in their own natures.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, II. 18.

We are heartily agreed in our detestation of civil wars.
Burke.

detester (dê-têst-ə-têr), n. One who detests.

To rob men and make God the receiver, who is the detester, and will be the punisher, of such crimes.
By Hopkins, On the First Commandment.

dethrone (dê-thrôn'), v. t.; pret. and pp. dethroned, pp. dethroning. [ML. dethronare, L. de-priv + thrōnus, a seat, throne: see throne. Cf. dethrone.] 1. To remove or drive from a throne; depose; divest of royal authority and dignity.

The former class demanded a distinct recognition of the right of subjects to dethrone bad princes.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., x.

2. To divest of rule, or of supreme power or authority.

The republicans, being dethroned by Cromwell, were the party whose resentment he had the greatest reason to apprehend.
Hume, Hist. Eng., VI. lxi.

dethronement (dê-thrôn'ment), n. [< dethrone + -ment.] Removal from a throne; deposition of a king, an emperor, or any supreme ruler.

The dethronement of a lawful king was held to be as little of a crime as the deposition of a wrongful usurper.
Curtis, Hist. Eng..

dethroner (dê-thrôn'êr), n. One who dethrones.
The hand of our dethroner . . . hath prevailed against and (to their power) blotted out the remembrance of the regal and sacerdotal throne.
Arnsey, The Tablet (ed. 1861), p. 178.

dethronization (dê-thrôn-iz-ə'shən), n. [< ML. as if "dethronizatio" (-n), < dethronizare, pp. dethroniscatus, equiv. to dethronare, dethrone: see dethrone. Cf. dethronize.] The act of dethroning. [Rare.]

As for the queen, when she was (God knows how farre guilty) advertised of her husband's dethronization, she outwardly expressed great extremity of passion.
Speed, Edw. II, IX. xii. § 73.

detinet (dê-ti-net), n. [L. he detains, 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. act. of detinere, detain: see detain.] An old action of debt at common law (chiefly in the phrase action in the detinet), founded on the allegation that defendant kept back the money, whether it was money due as his own debt (debit and detinet, he owes and detains), or was merely withheld, as where he was executor of the debtor. Sometimes used similarly of replevin for a chattel.

detinue (dê-ti-nū), n. [< OF. detenu, detenu, F. detenu, pp. of detenir, F. detenir, detain, < L. detinere: see detain.] In law, an old form of action, now little used, brought to recover possession of specific articles of personal property unlawfully detained.

By Action of debt action of detinue, bill, plaint, information, or otherwise.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 371.

detiny (dê-ti-ni), n. Detention; holding back what is due.

But this little detiny is great iniquity.
Riv. T. Adams, Works, I. 145.

detonable (dê-tô-nā-bl), a. [< deton (act) + -able.] Capable of detonating, or exploding on ignition.

These grades of dynamite are only rendered detonable by the admixture of explosive salts, and therefore the presence of these explosive salts does serve to perform a useful function.
Easter, Mod. High Explosives, p. 68.

detonate (dê-tô-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. detonated, pp. detonating. [< L. detonatus, pp. of detonari (> F. detoner = Sp. Pg. detonar), thunder, < de- + intensive + tonare, thunder: see thunder.] 1. trans. To cause to explode; specifically, to cause to explode with great suddenness and with a loud report.

II. intrans. To explode with great suddenness and with a loud noise: as, niter detonates with sulphur.

detonating (dê-tô-nā-ting), p. a. Exploding; igniting with a sudden report. — Detonating bulb, a small glass bulb cooled quickly as soon as made, and thus subjected to unequal strains of contraction. It will bear considerable pressure, but the scratch of a sharp grain of sand dropped upon it will cause it to fly into pieces. Also called Prince Rupert's drop. — Detonating powder, or fulminating powder, certain chemical compounds which, on being exposed to heat or suddenly struck, explode with a loud report, owing to the fact that one or more of the constituent parts suddenly assume the gaseous state. The chlorid and iodid of nitrogen are very powerful detonating substances. The compounds of ammonia with silver and gold, and the fulminates of silver and mercury, detonate by slight friction, or by the agency of heat, electricity, or sulphuric acid. — Detonating tube, a species of eudiometer, being a stout glass tube used in chemical analysis for detonating gaseous bodies. It is generally graduated into centesimal parts, and perforated by two opposed wires for the purpose of passing an electric spark through the gases which are introduced into it, and are confined within it over mercury and water.

detonation (dê-tô-nā'shən), n. [= F. détonation = Sp. detonacion = Pg. detonação, L. as if "detonatio" (-n), < detonare, thunder: see detonate.] An explosion or sudden report made by heating or striking certain combustible bodies, as fulminating gold; explosion in mass.

Detonation may be defined to be the instantaneous explosion of the whole mass of a body.

Easter, Mod. High Explosives, p. 84.

Democritus, in particular, exhibits consummate dexterity in this art [of ordering words with reference to effect]. At his pleasure, he separates his lightning and his thunder by an interval that allows his hearer half to forget the coming detonation.

G. P. Marsh, Lect. on Eng. Lang., xvi.

detonative (dê-tô-nā-tiv), a. [< detonate + -ive.] Capable of detonating; explosive.

When the gunpowder is exploded by nitro-glycerine its explosion becomes instantaneous; it becomes detonative; it occurs at a much higher temperature, produces a much larger volume of gas, and consequently develops a very much greater force than when exploded alone.

Easter, Mod. High Explosives, p. 88.

detonator (dê-tô-nā-tôr), n. [< detonate + -or.] That which detonates; a detonating preparation; a percussion-cap.

The man drew a pistol from under his cloak, and fired full in his face. Had it happened in these days of detonators, Frank's chance had been small.

Kingsley, Westward Ho, p. 88.

detonisation (dê-tô-niz-ə'shən), n. [< detones + -ation.] The act of detonating, as certain combustible bodies.

detonize (dê-tô-niz), v.; pret. and pp. detonized, pp. detonizing. [< L. detin-are, thunder (see detonate), + -ize.] 1. trans. To cause to ignite with an explosion; detonate.

Nineteen parts in twenty of detonated nitre is destroyed in eighteen days.
Arbuthnot, Effects of Air.

II. intrans. To take fire with a sudden report; detonate.

This precipitate . . . detonates with a considerable noise.
Fourcroy.

detortion, n. See detortion.

detort (dê-tôr't), r. t. [< L. detortus, pp. of detorquere (> F. détordre), turn aside, twist out of shape, < de, away, + torquere, twist: see tort. Cf. distort.] Same as detort.

They . . . have detorted texts of Scripture.
Dryden.

detortion (dê-tôr'shən), n. [= F. détorsion, L. as if "detortio" (-n) or "detorsio" (-n), < detorquere, pp. detortus or detortus, turn aside, twist out of shape: see detort.] Same as distortion. Also spelled detorsion.

Cross these detorsions, when it [the heart] downward tends, And when it to forbidden heights prebends.
Donne, Poems, p. 327.

detour (de-tôr'), n. [< F. détour, a turn, bend, circuit, < detourner, turn aside: see detour.] A turning; a roundabout or circuitous way; deviation from the direct or shortest road or route.

The path reached an impassable gorge, which occasioned a detour of two or three hours.
R. Taylor, Lauds of the Marston, p. 162.

Rhymes . . . sometimes, even in so abundant a language as the Italian, have driven the most slightest detour into an awkward detour.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 329.

detract (dê-trakt'), v. [< F. détracter = Sp. detractor = It. detrattare, L. detractare, also (with vowel-change) detractare, depreciate, detract from, also decline, refuse, freq. of detrachere (> It. detrarre = Sp. detrarre = Pg. detrarr = Fr. detrarre = OF. detrarre, > ME. detrayen: see detray), pp. detractus, pull down, take away, dispraise, detract from, < de, away, down, + trahere, draw: see tract.] 1. To take away; withdraw; abate: now always with a quantitative term as direct object, followed by from: as, the defect detracts little from the intrinsic value.

Shall I . . . detract so much from that prerogative, As to be call'd but viceroy of the whole?
Shak., I Hen. VI., v. 4.

The multitude of partners does detract nothing from each man's private share.
Boyle.

2. To depreciate the reputation or merit of; disparage; belittle; defame.

To malign, traduce, or detract the person or writings of Quintus Horatius Flaccus.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

Should I detract his worth, 'Twould argue want of merit in myself.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, I. 1.

= Syn. Derry, Depreciate, Detract from, etc. See derry.

II. intrans. To take away a part; hence, specifically, to take away reputation or merit: followed by from.

King Philip did not detract from the nation when he said he sent his armada to fight with men, and not to combat with the winds.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 17.

Such motives always detract from the perfect beauty even of good works.
Sumner, Fame and Glory.

"Virtue" and "utility" are ideas not only fundamentally distinct, but so far in natural opposition, that the existence of utility in an action may now and again detract from its virtue.
Mewart, Nature and Thought, p. 180.

detractor, n. See detractor.

detractingly (dê-trakt'ing-ly), adv. In a detracting manner; injuriously.

Rather by a hidden and oblique way insinuate his error to him than detractingly blame it.
By. Henshaw, Daily Thoughts (ed. 1861), p. 12.

detractio (dê-trakt'io), n. [< ME. detractio, -tion, -clous, < OF. detractio, F. détraction = Fr. detraccio, detraccio = Sp. detraccion = Pg. detraccão = It. detraccione, L. detractio (-n), a taking away, purging, Lit. detractio, < de-trahere, pp. detractus, take away, detract: see detract.] 1. A withdrawing; a taking away; removal.

You shall acquire of the lawful taking of partridges, and pheasants, or fowl, the detractio of the eggs of the said wild fowl, &c.

Reven, Change at Session for the Venge, p. 12.

2. The act of disparaging or belittling the reputation or worth of a person, with the view to lessen or lower him in the estimation of others; the act of depreciating the powers or performances of another, from envy or malice.

Speaking well of all Mankind is the worst kind of Detraction; for it takes away the Reputation of the good Men in the World, by making all alike.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, I. 1.

Let malice and the base detraction of contemporary jealousy say what it will, greater originality of genius, more expansive variety of talent, never was exhibited than in our country since the year 1788.

De Quincey, Style, III.

—Syn. 2. Depreciation, disparagement, slander, calumny, defamation, derogation.

detractionist (dē-trak'ti-ōn), a. [< detraction; cf. ambitious, < ambition.] Containing detraction; lessening reputation. Johnson.

detractive (dē-trak'tiv), a. [< OF. detractif; as detract + -ive.] 1. Having the quality or power of drawing or taking away.

Finding that his patient hath any store of herbs in his garden, [the surgeon] straightway will apply a detractive plaster.

E. Knight, Trial of Truth (1880), fol. 28.

2. Seeking or tending to lessen repute or estimation; depreciative; defamatory.

The iniquity of an envious and detractive adversary.

Sp. Norton, Discharge of Imput, p. 276.

I'll not give

Such satisfaction to detractive tongues,
That publish such foul doles against a man
I know for truly virtuous.

Beau. and Fl. (?), Faithful Friends, I. 1.

detractiveness (dē-trak'tiv-nes), n. The quality of being detractive. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

detractor (dē-trak'tr), n. [< ME. detractor, < L. detractor, < detrachere, pp. detractus, disparage: see detract.] One who detracts, or takes away or injures the good name of another; one who attempts to disparage or belittle the worth or honor of another. Sometimes written detractor.

His [Milton's] detractors, however, though outvoted, have not been silenced.

Macaulay, Milton.

There was a chorus of praise from former detractors.

Literary Era, II. 182.

—Syn. Slanderer, calumniator, defamer, vilifier.

detractory (dē-trak'tō-ri), a. [< L. detractorius, disparaging, < L. detractor, a detractor: see detractor.] Depreciative; calumnious; disparaging.

This is . . . detractory unto the intellect and sense of man.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., I. 5.

The detractory lye takes from a great man the reputation that justly belongs to him.

Arbutnot.

detractress (dē-trak'tres), n. [< detractor + -ess.] A female detractor; a censorious woman. [Rare.]

If any shall detract from a lady's character unless she be absent, the said detractress shall be forthwith ordered to the lowest place of the room.

Addison.

detrain (dē-trān'), v. [< de-priv. + train.] 1. trans. To remove from or cause to leave a railway train: said especially of bodies of men: as, to detrain troops. [Of recent introduction.]

He [Moses] detracted his going into Egypt, upon pretence that he was not eloquent.

Fatherly, Atheismistix (1822), p. 194.

2. trans. To refuse.

Do not detract; you know th' authority Is mine.

B. Jones, New Inn, II. 2.

detractment (dē-trak'tment), n. [< OF. detractment, < L. detractio(n)-, < detractare, pp. detractatus, refuse: see detract.] 1. Any kind of harm or injury, as loss, damage, hurt, injustice, deterioration, diminution, hindrance, etc., considered with specific reference, expressed or implied, both to its subject and to its cause: as, the cause of religion suffers great detractment from the faults of its professors; let the property suffer no detractment at your hands; the consuls must see that the republic receives no detractment; the detractment it has suffered is past remedy.

Also, not to be passionate for small detractments or offences, nor to be a revenger of them.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 249.

Being from the feeling of her own grief brought
By deep surmises of others' detractment.

Shak., Lucrece, I. 1579.

That barefoot Augustinian whose report
Of the dying woman's words did detractment
To my best points.

Browning, Ring and Book, II. 220.

2. That which causes harm or injury; anything that is detrimental: as, his generosity is a great detractment to his prosperity.—3. In England, a charge made upon barristers and students for repair of damages in the rooms they occupy; a charge for wear and tear of table-linen, etc.—4. In astrology, the sign opposite the house of any planet: as, Mars in Libra is in his detractment; the detractment of the sun is Aquarius, because it is opposite to Leo. It is a sign of weakness, distress, etc.—5. In her.: (a) Same as decrement. (b) The state of being eclipsed—that is, represented as partially obscured: said of the sun or moon used as a bearing.

—Syn. 1. Disadvantage, prejudice, hurt, evil. See injury and loss.

Others might be detractment thereby.

Fuller.

detrimental (dē-tri-men'tal), a. and n. [< ML. detrimentalis, < L. detrimentum, harm: see detract.] 1. a. Injurious; hurtful; causing harm or damage.

Luxuries are rather serviceable than detrimental to an opulent people.

Goldsmith, Voltaire.

Political economy teaches that restrictions upon commerce are detrimental. 2. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 601.

—Syn. Prejudicial, disadvantageous, mischievous, pernicious.

3. n. See the extract. [Slang.]

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you don't happen to know what a detrimental is. He is a person who pays great attention to a young lady without any serious intentions, and thereby discourages the intentions of others.

Auberon Herbert.

detrimentally (dē-tri-men'tal-ly), adv. In a detrimental manner; injuriously.

That the impoverishment of any country, diminishing both its producing and consuming powers, tells detrimentally on the people of countries trading with it, is a commonplace of political economy.

II. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 81.

detrimentalness (dē-tri-men'tal-nes), n. The quality of being detrimental. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

detrital (dē-tri'tal), a. [< detritus + -al.] Consisting of fragments or particles broken or worn away.

The detrital matter which is worn away from the land, and carried along by rivers, contains materials of every degree of coarseness.

Huxley, Physicography, p. 122.

Detrital rock, a rock made up of the debris of other rocks—that is, of material derived from rocks previously consolidated, then broken up by atmospheric or other agencies, and more or less worn by friction or by the action of water.

detritus (dē-tri't), a. [< L. detritus, pp. of detrere, rub down or away, < de, down, away, + terere, rub: see trite. Cf. detriment.] Worn away; worn out.

Clarkes.

detrited (dē-tri'ted), a. [< detritus + -ed.] 1. Worn away; reduced by detrition.

A halfpenny detrited.

N. and G., 7th ser., IV. 124.

2. Disintegrated; of the nature of detritus.

Long, symmetrical tables, two hundred feet long by eighty broad, covered with large angular rocks and boulders, and seemingly impregnated throughout with detrital matter.

Kene, Soc. Grinn. Exp., II. 127.

detrition (dē-tri'shon), n. [< F. detritio(n)-, < ML. detritio(n)-, < L. detere, pp. detritus, rub off: see detritus, detritus.] A wearing off; the act of wearing away.

The brush of time is the gradual detrition of time.

Shoemaker, Note on Shakespeare's 2 Hen. VI.

detritus (dē-tri'tus), n. [< L. detritus, a rubbing away, < detere, pp. detritus, rub away: see detritus.] 1. In geol., loose, uncompacted fragments of rock, either water-worn or angular. The term is especially applicable to a material which would be a breccia if consolidated into a rock. See gravel, sand, and drift.

2. More comprehensively, any broken or comminuted material worn away from a mass by attrition; any aggregate of loosened fragments or particles.

Here Dr. Schilleman encountered a great depth of soil, partly due to the accumulation of detritus from the rocky ground above.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 257.

Such natural agents as wind and water, frost and fire, are ever at work in destroying the surface of the land and transporting the resulting detritus.

Athenæum, No. 2067, p. 178.

Words which have thus for ages preserved their exact form in the mass of detritus of which modern languages are composed.

Farrar, Language, xv.

de trop (dē trō'), [F., too much, too many: de, of; trop = It. troppo, too much, < ML. troppus, troplus, a flock, troop: see troop.] Literally, too much; hence, in the way; not wanted: applied to a person whose presence is inconvenient: as, he saw he was de trop, and therefore retired.

detrude (dē-trōd'), v. t.; pret. and pp. detruded, ppr. detruding. [= It. detrudere, < L. detrudere, pp. detrusus, thrust down, < de, down, + trudere, thrust. Cf. extrude, intrude, protrude.] To thrust down or out; push down with force; force into, or as if into, a lower place or sphere.

Such as are detruded down to hell,
Either, for shame, they still themselves retire,
Or, tied in chains, they in close prison dwell.

Sp. J. Davies, Immortal of Soul.

Those philosophers who allow of transmigration . . . are of opinion that the souls of men may, for their misdeeds, be detruded into the bodies of beasts.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. 27.

It [envy] . . . leads him into the very condition of devils, to be detruded [from] Heaven for his merely pride and malice.

Feltham, Resolves, II. 54.

detruncate (dē-trung'kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. detruncated, ppr. detruncating. [< L. detruncatus, pp. of detruncare, lop off, < de, off, + truncare, lop, shorten by cutting off, < truncus, cut short: see trunk, truncate.] To reduce or shorten by lopping or cutting off a part.

detruncation (dē-trung-kā'shon), n. [< L. detruncatio(n)-, < detruncare, lop off: see detruncate.] 1. The act of reducing or shortening; the cutting or lopping off of a part.

It may sometimes happen, by hasty detruncation, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed.

Johnson, Dict., Pref.

2. In obstet., separation of the trunk from the head of the fetus. Dunglison.

detrusion (dē-trō'shun), n. [< LL. detrusio(n)-, < L. detrudere, pp. detrusus: see detrude.] The act of thrusting or driving down or away.

From this detrusion of the waters towards the side, the parts towards the pole must be much increased.

Kell, Burnett's Theory of the Earth.

Force of detrusion, in mech., the strain to which a body, as a beam, is subjected when it is compressed in a direction perpendicular to the length of the fibers, the points of support being very near to and on opposite sides of the place at which the force is applied.

detrusor (dē-trō'sr), n.; pl. detrusores (dē-trō'sō-rēz). [NL., < L. detrudere, pp. detrusus, expel: see detrude.] In anat., a muscle that ejects or expels.

detter, n. A Middle English and early modern English form of debt.

detumescence (dē-tū-mes'ens), n. [= F. detumescence, < L. detumescere (t-), ppr. of detumescere, cease swelling, settle down, < de, down, + tumescere, inceptive of tumere, swell: see tumid.] Diminution of swelling: opposed to tumescence.

The wider the circulating wave grows, still hath it the more subsidence and detumescence.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 581.

detur (dē-tēr'), [L., let it be given, 3d pers. pres. subj. pass. of dare, give; so called from the first word of the Latin inscription accompanying the gift: see date.] A prize of books given annually to a certain number of meritorious students at Harvard College.

At one o'clock all those who were fortunate enough to obtain deture went to the President [of Harvard College] to receive them.

Joshiah Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 50.

deturb (dē-tərb'), v. t. [< L. deturbare, drive, thrust, or cast down, < de, down, + turbare, throw into disorder, < turba, disorder, a crowd, troop: see turbid. Cf. disturb.] To throw into confusion; throw down with violence.

As soon may the walls of heaven be scaled and thy throne detruded as he can be foiled that is defended with thy power.

Sp. Hall, Invisible World.

detourn (dē-tōrn'), v. t. [< F. détournar, < OF. destourner, destourner, turn away, < des, away, + tourner, turn. Cf. detour and disturn.] To turn away or aside; divert.

His majesty grantit his expresse license . . . to alter and detourne a Hill the said way, to the main commodious & better travelling for the lieges.

Acts Jac. VI., 1607 (ed. 1216), p. 222.

The sober aspect and severity of bare precepts deturn many from lending a pleased ear to the wholesome doctrine. Sir R. Ligon, Nature of Man's Soul, III.

deturpate (dê-têr-pât), v. t.; pret. and pp. deturpated, ppr. deturpating. [L. deturpatus, pp. of deturpare, disfigure, < de- intensive + turpare, defile, < turpis, foul: see turpitude.] To defile.

Errors, superstitions, heresies, and impleties, which had deturpated the face of the Church. Ser. Taylor, Disc. from Popery, I. 1.

deturpation (dê-têr-pâ'shon), n. [deturpate: see -ation.] The act of defiling or corrupting; a corruption.

The books of the fathers have passed through the corruptions, and deturpations, and mistakes of transcribers. Ser. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, IV. 100.

deuce (dûs), n. [Also formerly deuce, duce, early mod. E. also deuce, deuce, < ME. deuce, deus, < OF. Deus / later Deus / I. e., God! (used, like mod. F. mon Dieu! G. mein Gott! as an ejaculation of sudden emotion or surprise), < L. deus, voc. of deus, God: see deity. The common derivation from the Celtic (Bret. "deu, teu", a phantom, specter, goblin"; ML. "diuvius, demon apud Gallos") is without sufficient support. Cf. LG. dûs, duus, G. daus, tous, used like the E. word: LG. de duns! G. der duns! the deuce! G. was der duns! what the deuce! dass dich der duns! deuce take you! Cf. Fries. dûs, a goblin (Outsen); D. droes, a giant, LG. droos, a lubber, Holstein drusus, a giant, used like dûs; D. de droes! LG. de droes! the deuce! LG. dat di de droes slaat! Holstein dat ti de droes haie! deuce take you! The particular use of the D., LG., and G. words may be due to association with the OF. word, but they are appar. in origin assimilated and transposed forms, respectively, of the word represented by OHG. dura, duris, thurs, turs, MHG. duras, dûres, dûrech, also turas, thurs, thursch, a giant, demon, = Icel. thurs (pron. thurs), a giant, goblin, dull fellow, = Norw. tuss, dial. tusse, fust, a goblin, kobold, elf, gnome (tussfolk, elves), also a dull fellow, = Dan. toese, a booby, fool, = AS. thyr, a giant (whence prob. E. thrush in kob-thrush, q. v., a hobgoblin). The giants or goblins of Teutonic mythology, like the gods of classical mythology, became identified in popular thought with the devils or demons of medieval Christianity. Like other words used in colloquial imprecation, deuce has lost definite meaning, and has been subjected (in LG., G., and Scand.) to more or less wilful variation of form and to some mixture with other words. Cf. LG. de duns! equiv. to E. the dickens! LG. dûker, deuker, deiker, the deuce.] The devil: used, with or without the definite article, chiefly in exclamatory or interjectional phrases, expressing surprise, impatience, or emphasis: as, deuce take you! go to the deuce! the deuce you did!

Owe! deuces! all goes down! York Plays, p. 4.

I wish you could tell what a Deuce your Head alla. Prior, Down-Hall, st. 40.

It was the prettiest prologue as he wrote it; Well! the deuce take me if I ha'n't forgot it. Congress.

To play the deuce, to do mischief or damage; annoy or injure a person or thing: often followed by with.

Three of them left the door open, and the other two pulled it so spitefully in going out that the little bell played the very deuce with Hepzibah's nerves. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, p. 73.

deuce (dûs), n. [Early mod. E. also deuce, deus; = MLG. dus = OHG. dûs, G. dus = Sw. Dan. dus, deuce in cards, < OF. dous, dous, F. doux, < L. dous, acc. of duo = E. two, q. v.] 1. In cards and other games, two; a card or die with two spots. — 2. In lawn-tennis, a stage of the game in which both players or sides have scored 40, and one must score 2, or, if the other has vantage, 3 points in succession in order to win the game.

deuce-ace (dûs'âs), n. Two and one; a throw of two dice, one of which turns up one and the other two.

Notk. Then, I am sure, you know how much the gross sum of deuce-ace amounts to.

Arm. It doth amount to one more than two.

Notk. Which the base vulgar call three. Shak., I. I. I., l. 2.

deuced (dû'sed), a. [Sometimes written deused, and, for colloq. effect, doosed, doosed; < deuce + -ed.] The word combines in a mitigated form the ideas of devilish and darned.] Devilish; excessive; confounded: as, it is a deuced shame: often used adverbially. [Slang.]

Everything is so deuced changed.

Durast, Coningsby, viii. 4.

It'll be a deuced unpleasant thing if she takes it into her head to let out when those fellows are here. Dehane.

deucedly, deusedly (dû'sed-lî), adv. Devilishly; confoundedly.

deuse, n. See deuce.

deuse, deused, etc. See deuce, etc.

Deus miserator (dê'us mis'g-rê-â'ter). [L. God be merciful: Deus, God; miserator, 3d pers. sing. pres. subj. of miserari, be merciful: see miserere.] The sixty-seventh psalm: so called from its first words in the Latin version. It is used in the Anglican Church as a canticle alternate to the Nunc dimittis after the second lesson at Evening Prayer, except on the twelfth day of the month, because it then occurs as one of the appointed psalms for the day. In the American Prayer-book it was the leading canticle in this place till the Nunc dimittis was restored in 1885, and has, in turn, the Benedic, and Gloria, as its alternate.

Deut. An abbreviation of Deuteronomy.

deutencephalic (dû-tên-se-fai'lik or -sef'g-lik), a. [deutencephalon + -ic.] Same as diencephalic.

deuterion (dû-tê-ri-on), n. [NL., < Gr. deuteron, second, or pl. deutepia, the afterbirth, neut. of deutepios, < deutepos, second.] In anat., the afterbirth or secundines.

deutero- [LL., NL., etc., deutero-, < Gr. deuteron, second, < duo, = E. two, + compar. suffix -ter.] An element in words of Greek origin, meaning 'second.'

deuterocanonical (dû-tê-ro-kâ-non'i-kal), a. [Gr. deuteron, second, + canonikâ.] Forming or belonging to a second canon. — Deuterocanonical books, those books of the Bible as received by the Roman Catholic Church which are regarded as constituting a second canon, accepted later than the first, but of equal authority. These books are, in the Old Testament, most of those called the Apocrypha in the King James Bible, and in the New Testament those known as antilegomena. See antilegomena and Apocrypha.

deuterogamist (dû-tê-ro-gâ-mist), n. [deuterogamy + -ist.] One who marries a second time.

He had published for me against the deuterogamists of the age. Goldsmith, Vicar, xvii.

deuterogamy (dû-tê-ro-gâ-mî), n. [= F. deutrogamie, < Gr. deutropogamia, a second marriage, < deutepos, second, + gâmos, marriage.] A second marriage after the death of the first husband or wife, or the custom of contracting such marriages.

You behold before you . . . Dr. Primrose, the monogamist. . . . You here see that . . . divine who has so long . . . fought against the deuterogamy of the age. Goldsmith, Vicar, xiv.

deutrogenic (dû-tê-rô-jen'ik), a. [Gr. deuteron, second, + gênos, race (see genus), + -ic.] Of secondary origin: specifically applied in geology to those rocks which have been derived from the protogenic rocks by mechanical action.

deuteromeres (dû-tê-rô-mê'sal), a. [Gr. deuteron, second, + meros, middle, + -al.] Literally, second and median: applied in entomology, by Kirby and other early entomologists, to a series of cells in the wings of hymenopterous insects, called the first and third discoidal and first apical cells by most modern hymenopterists.

Deuteronomie (dû-tê-rô-nom'ik), a. [Deuteronomy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the book of Deuteronomy: as, the Deuteronomie code.

Deuteronomical (dû-tê-rô-nom'i-kal), a. Same as Deuteronomie.

This is the second code, and is called the Deuteronomical Code, because it makes up the bulk of the book of Deuteronomy. Misart, Nineteenth Century, XXII. 30.

Deuteronomist (dû-tê-rôn'ô-mist), n. [Deuteronomy + -ist.] 1. The writer or one of the writers of the book of Deuteronomy.

It appears certain that the deologue as it lay before the Deuteronomist did not contain any allusion to the creation. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 125.

2. One of the school of criticism which regards Deuteronomy as a product of an era of Jewish history long subsequent to the days of Moses.

Deuteronomistic (dû-tê-rôn'ô-mistik), a. [Deuteronomist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the writer or writers of the book of Deuteronomy. The word is used in that school of criticism which regards Deuteronomy as a product of an era of Jewish history long subsequent to the days of Moses.

The process of "prophetic" or "Deuteronomistic" editing. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 111.

Deuteronomy (dû-tê-rôn'ô-mî), n. [= F. deuteronomie = Sp. Pg. It. deuteronomio, < LL. deuteronomium, < LG. deutropogon, the second law, the fifth book of the Pentateuch, < Gr. deutepos, second, + gâmos, law.] The second law, or second statement of the law: the name given to the fifth book of the Pentateuch, consisting chiefly of three addresses purporting to have been made by Moses to Israel shortly before his death. The Mosiac origin of the book is disputed by many modern critics, as is also the date of composition, which some regard as subsequent to Isaiah. Abbreviated Deut.

deuteropathia (dû-tê-rô-path'i-â), n. [NL.: see deutropathy.] Same as deutropathy.

deutropathia (dû-tê-rô-path'ik), a. [= F. deutropathique; as deutropathy + -ic.] Pertaining to deutropathy.

deutropathy (dû-tê-ro-pâ-thî), n. [= F. deutropathie, < NL. deuteropathia, < Gr. deutepos, second, + πάθος, suffering.] In pathol., a secondary affection, the result of another and antecedent affection, as retinitis from nephritis.

deuteroscopy (dû-tê-ro's-kô-pî), n. [= F. deuteroscopie, < Gr. deutepos, second, + σκοπία, < σκοπεῖν, view.] 1. Second sight. [Rare.]

I felt by anticipation the horrors of the Highland scow, whom their gift of deuteroscopy compels to witness things unseen for mortal eyes. Scott.

2. The second view, or that which is seen upon a second view; the meaning beyond the literal sense; second intention. [Rare.]

Not attaining the deuteroscopy, or second intention of the words, they are fain to omit their consequences, coherences, figures, or tropologies. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

deuterostoma (dû-tê-ro's-tô-mâ), n.; pl. deuterostomata (dû-tê-rô's-tô-mâ-tâ). [NL., < Gr. deuteron, second, + στόμα, mouth.] A secondary blastopore; a blastopore formed after or otherwise than as an archæostoma.

Deuterostomata (dû-tê-rô's-tô-mâ-tâ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of deuterostomatus: see deuterostomatous.] A prime division of the phylum Vermes, including those worms, such as most annelids, the Polysoa, and Sagitta, which are deuterostomatous: opposed to Archæostomata.

deuterostomatous (dû-tê-rô's-tô-mâ-tus), a. [NL. deuterostomatus, < deuterostoma, q. v.] Having a deuterostoma; characterized by a secondary instead of a primary blastopore: opposed to archæostomatous.

In certain . . . deuterostomatous Metazoa, the mesoblast becomes excavated, and a "perivisceral cavity" and vessels are formed in quite another fashion. Huxley, Encyc. Brit., II. 53.

deuterostolid (dû-tê-rô's-tô'id), n. [Gr. deuteron, second, + σολῖδ, q. v.] A secondary stolid; a stolid produced by gemmation from a stolid; a proglottis.

deutrohydroguret, deutohydroguret (dû-tê-rô-hî-drog'û-ret), n. [Gr. deuteron, second, + hydrog(en) + -uret.] In chem., an old term for a compound of two equivalents of hydrogen with one of some other element.

deuto- [Abbr. of deutero-, < Gr. deuteron, second: see deutero-.] In chem., a prefix which denotes strictly the second term in an order or a series. Often used as equivalent to bi- or di- with reference to the constitution of compounds, distinguishing them from mono- or proto- compounds.

deutohydroguret, n. See deutrohydroguret.

dentomala (dû-tô-mâ-lâ), n.; pl. dentomala (-lâ). [NL., < Gr. deuteron, second, next, + L. mala, cheek-bone, jaw, < mandere, chew, masticate: see mandible.] The second pair of jaws, or mouth-appendages, of the Myriapoda, forming the so-called labium or under lip of Savigny and later authors. In the chilogaths they have a superficial resemblance to the labium of winged insects; but the corresponding pair of appendages in Chilopoda are not only unlike the labium of Hemiptera, but entirely different in structure from the homologous parts in chilogaths.

dentomalal (dû-tô-mâ-lal), a. [dentomala + -al.] Same as dentomalar.

dentomalar (dû-tô-mâ-lâr), a. [dentomala + -ar.] Of or pertaining to the dentomala of a myriapod.

deutomerite (dû-tom'g-rît), n. [Gr. deuteron, second, + μερος, a part, + -itis.] In zool., the larger posterior one of the two cells of a dielysidan or septate gregarine, as distinguished from the smaller anterior one called protomerite.

deutoplasm (dû-tô-plasm), n. [Gr. deuteron, second, + πλάσμα, anything formed, < πλάσσω, form, mold.] In embryol., secondary, nutritive plasm, or food-yolk: a term applied by the younger Van Beneden to that portion of the yolk of an egg or ovum which furnishes food for the nourishment of the embryo, but does not enter directly into its formation or germination. The great bulk of the yolk of macrobiotic ova, as bird's eggs, consists of the nutritive deutoplasm or food-yolk, as distinguished from the protoplasm or tread, which makes up into the body of the chick.

In fact, the contents of every egg consist of two parts—(1) of a viscous albuminous protoplasm; and (2) of a fatty granular matter, the deutoplasm or food yolk. The first is derived from the protoplasm of the original germinal cell, while the yolk is only secondarily developed with the gradual growth of the first; and not unfrequently it is derived from the secretion of special glands.

Class. Zoology (trans.), I. 111.

deutoplasmic (dū-tō-plas'mik), a. [< deutoplasm + -ic.] Of or pertaining to deutoplasm; having the character or quality of deutoplasm; consisting of deutoplasm. Also deutoplasmic.

In the young unfertilized ova a small protoplasmic and larger deutoplasmic portion are readily distinguished.

Jour. Roy. Micro. Soc., 2d ser., VI. 234.

deutoplasmigenous (dū-tō-plas-mij'e-nus), a. [NL., < deutoplasm + (-i)-genous, q. v.] Producing deutoplasm, as a deutoplasmic ovum, or an animal whose ova are meroblastic. Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 425.

deutoplastic (dū-tō-plas'tik), a. [< Gr. deutē (epoc), second, + πλαστικός, verbal adj. of πλασσειν, form, + -ic: see plastic.] Same as deutoplasmic.

deutopsyche (dū-tōp-sī'kē), n. [NL., < Gr. deutē (epoc), second, + ψυχή, breath, life, spirit, soul.] Haeckel's name for that part of the brain which is usually called the diencephalon or thalamencephalon; a part of the brain consisting chiefly of the optic thalami.

deutosecolex (dū-tō-akō'leks), n.; pl. deutosecolexes (-lē-ks). [NL., < Gr. deutē (epoc), second, + σκώληξ, worm.] A secondary scolex or daughter-cyst developed within or from a scolex or cystic worm; a bladder-worm inclosed in another, as, in an echinococcus, the hydatid of Tenia echinococcus. See cut under Tenia.

deutotergite (dū-tō-tēr'jīt), n. [< Gr. deutē (epoc), second, + L. tergum, back, + -ite.] In entom., the second dorsal segment of the abdomen.

deutova, n. Plural of deutovum.

deutovertebra (dū-tō-vēr'tē-brā), n.; pl. deutovertebrae (-brē). [NL., < Gr. deutē (epoc), second, + L. vertebra, vertebra.] In Carus's nomenclature (1828), one of the segments of the vertebral column exclusive of ribs and limbs; a vertebra in an ordinary sense.

He [Carus] makes what he calls proto-, deuto-, and trito-vertebrae; the first (ribs) enveloping the body and its viscera in relation with vegetative life; and the second (vertebrae) protecting the nervous system; and the third (limbs) becoming the osseous framework which sustains the muscular and locomotive organs.

S. Knerland, Jr., Amer. Cyc., XIII. 424.

deutovertebral (dū-tō-vēr'tē-brāl), a. [< deutovertebra + -al.] Having the character or quality of a deutovertebra; vertebral in an ordinary sense.

deutovum (dū-tō-vūm), n.; pl. deutova (-vū). [NL., < Gr. deutē (epoc), second, + L. ovum, egg.] Same as metovum.

deutoxid (dū-tōk'sid), n. [< Gr. deutē (epoc), second, + oxid.] In chem., a term formerly employed to denote the second stage of oxidation, or a compound containing two atoms of oxygen to one or more of a metal; as, the deutoxid of copper; the deutoxid of mercury, etc. Also deutoxide, binoxid, binoxide, and deutoxyde, binoxyde, dioxid.

Later in the earth's history are the deutoxides, tritoxides, peroxides, etc.; in which two, three, four, or more atoms of oxygen are united with one atom of metal or other element. H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 40.

Deutzia (dōit'si-ā), n. [NL., named after Deutz, a botanist of Amsterdam.] A saxifrageous genus of handsome flowering shrubs of China and Japan, frequent in cultivation, bearing numerous panicles of white flowers. There are six or seven species, the common cultivated ones being D. ornata and the smaller species D. gracilis, of which there are several varieties.

deux-temps (dē'zōn'), n. [F.: deux, two; temps, < L. tempus, time: see deuce<sup>2</sup> and temporal.] A rapid form of the waltz, containing six steps to every two of the trois-temps or regular waltz. The name is given both to the dance and to the music composed for it. Also called vaive & deux temps or deux-temps waltz.

A girl who could . . . sit in the middle for a twenty-mile ride and dance the deux-temps half the night afterward. Harper's Map, LXXVI. 611.

deusant, n. A kind of apple.

For is it every apple I desire,
For that which planneth every palate best;
Tis not the lasting deusant I require.

For yet the red-cheek'd queneering I request.
Quarles, Emblems, v. 2.

dev (dev'), n. [Hind. dev, Pers. dēv, Zend dæva, a demon, an evil spirit, Skt. deva, a god: see deva, deity.] In Persian myth., an evil spirit; a ministering demon of Ahri-man. Sometimes written deev (Pers. dēv). See deva.

Among the Persians the Indian terminology is transposed, the great Asura representing the good creating principle, and the devs being the evil spirits.

Amer. Cyc., V. 708.

deva (dā'vā), n. [Skt. (Hind., etc.), divine, a divinity, a god: see deity.] 1. In Hindu myth., a god or divinity; one of an order of good spirits, opposed to the asuras, or wicked spirits.

The Devas knew the signs, and said,

Buddha will go again to help the World.

E. Arnold, Light of Asia, l. 12.

2. [cop.] [NL.] In soöl., a genus of lepidopterous insects. Walker, 1857.

devalgate (dē-val'gāt), a. [< NL. "devalgatus, < L. de, away, + valga, bow-legged.] Having bowed legs; bandy-legged. Thomas, Med. Diet.

devall (de-vāl'), v. t. [Sc., also written devald; appar. < OF. devaller, < ML. devallare, descend, send down, demit (cf. devallis, down-hill), < L. de, down, + vallis, valley. Cf. avale. The sense in E. is appar. due in part to default, default.] To intermit; cease. Jamieson.

devall (de-vāl'), n. [Sc., also written devald; from the verb.] Stop; cessation; intermission: as, it rained ten days without devall.

Devā-nagari (dā-vā-nā'gā-rī), n. [Skt., lit. Nagari of the gods, < deva, a god, + nagari, one of the alphabets of India, that in which the Sanskrit is usually written: see Nagari.] The Sanskrit alphabet: same as Nagari.

The term Devanagari, which would mean the divine or sacred Nagari, is not used by the natives of India, and seems to have been invented by some ingenious Anglo-Indian about the end of the last century. It has, however, established itself in works on Indian Paleography, and may be conveniently retained to denote that particular type of the Nagari character employed in printed books for the sacred Sanskrit literature, while the generic term Nagari may serve as the designation of the whole class of vernacular alphabets of which the Devanagari is the literary type. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 248.

devaporation (dē-vap-ō-rā'shūn), n. [< "de-vaporate, v. (< de- priv. + vapor + -ate): see -ation, and cf. evaporation.] The change of vapor into water, as in the formation of rain. Smart.

The thirty years' war that devastated Germany did not begin till the eighteenth year of the seventeenth century, but the seeds of it were sowing some time before.

Bolingbroke, Study of History.

devastate (dev'as-tāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. devastated, ppr. devastating. [< L. devastatus, pp. of devastare, lay waste (see devast), < de, away, + vastare, lay waste, < vastus, waste, desolate, vast: see vast and waste.] To lay waste; ravage; make desolate.

In the midst of war Cyprus was again, for the third time since the Black Death, devastated by the plague. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 200.

All the tides

Of death and change might rise

And devastate the world, yet I could see

This steady abiding spark

Should live eternally.

C. Theaster, Footprints in the Sand.

=syn. To harry, waste, strip, pillage, plunder.

devastation (dev-as-tā'shūn), n. [= F. dévastation = Sp. devastacion = Pg. devastacão = It. devastazione, < L. as if "devastatio(n), < devastare, devastate: see devastate.] 1. The act of devastating, or the state of being devastated; waste; ravage; havoc.

Even now the devastation is begun,

And half the business of destruction done.

Goldsmith.

Simple devastation

Is the worm's task, and what he has destroyed

His monument. Lowell, Oriental Apologue.

Tam Samson's deld!

Burns, Tam Samson's Elegy.

As gude downright devel will split it, I see warrant ye.

Scott, Antiquary, xiv.

devel<sup>3</sup> (dev'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. develed, develed, ppr. develing, develing. [< devel<sup>2</sup>, n.] To give a heavy blow to.

develin (dev'g-lin), n. See develing, 3.

develop (dē-vel'up), v. [Also develop; < F. développer, OF. desveloper, desveloper, desveloper, < des-, L. de-, apart, + velop-, found elsewhere only in enveloper, wrap up: see envelop.] I. trans. 1. To uncover or unfold gradually; lay open by successive steps; disclose or make known in detail, as something not apparent or withheld from notice; bring or work out in full: as, the general began to develop the plan of his operations; to develop a plot; to develop an idea.

The character of Tiberius is extremely difficult to develop.

Cumberbund.

From the day of his first appearance, [Pitt] was always heard with attention; and exercise soon developed the great powers which he possessed.

Macaulay, William Pitt.

Would you learn at full

How passion runs thro' circumstantial grades

Beyond all grades develop it!

Tennyson, Gardener's Daughter.

In him [Keats] a vigorous understanding developed itself in equal measure with the divine faculty.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 235.

2. In photog., to induce the chemical changes in (the film of) a plate which has been exposed in the camera or of a gelatino-bromide print) necessary to cause a latent image or picture to become visible, and, in the case of a negative, to assume proper density to admit of reproduction by a process of printing.—3. In biol., to cause to go through the process of natural evolution from a previous and lower stage, or from an embryonic state to a later and more complex or perfect one.

Where eyes are so little developed that approaching objects are recognised only as intercepting the sunshine, it is obvious that contrasts of light and shade which seem marked to animals with developed eyes are quite imperceptible.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 92.

4. In math.: (a) To express in an extended form, as in a series, which lends itself more readily to computation or other treatment. (b) To bend, as a surface; especially, to unbend into a plane.—syn. 1. To uncover, unfold, disentangle, exhibit, unravel.

II. intrans. 1. To advance from one stage to another by a process of natural or inherent evolution; specifically, in biol., to pass from the lowest stage through others of greater maturity toward the perfect or finished state: as, the fetus develops in the womb; the seed develops into the plant.

Because not poets enough to understand That life develops from within.

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, II.

The peripheral cells of the developing wood become those which bear their liquid contents squeezed out longitudinally and laterally with the greatest force.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 282.

2. To become apparent; show itself: as, his schemes developed at length; specifically, in photog., to become visible, as a picture under the process of development. See development, 5.—3. In biol., to evolve; accomplish an evolutionary process or result.

developable (dē-vel'up-ā-bl), a. and n. [< develop + -able, after F. développable.] I. a. 1. Capable of developing or of being developed.

Made at this time bounds forward in the joy of an infinitely developable principle.

S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 142.

2. In geom., reducible to a plane by bending; applied to a particular species of ruled surface, otherwise called a torse, which is conceived as formed by an infinite succession of straight lines, each intersecting the next.—Developable helicoid. See helicoid.

II. a. In geom., a singly infinite continuous succession of straight lines, each intersecting the next; a torse. The word developable is used as a noun by modern geometers, because they do not consider this locus to be properly a surface. It is rather a skew curve regarded under a particular aspect. A developable is generated by a line which turns about a point in itself, while this point moves along the line. The locus of the point is a skew curve, called the edge of regression of the developable, to which the line is constantly tangent. The developable is thus the locus of tangents of a skew curve. Considering the osculating plane at any fixed point of this curve, the moving tangent comes up to this plane so that for an instant its motion is in the plane and then passes off; and the result is that the curve is a cuspidal edge of the developable considered as a surface.—Polar developable of a skew curve, the surface enveloped by its normal planes. The locus of the center of curvature of the skew curve is the edge of regression, while the axis of curvature is the generator of the polar developable.

developed (dê-vel'up-t), p. a. [Fr. de develop, v.] 1. Unfolded; laid open; disclosed.—2. In her., same as disrupted.

developer (dê-vel'up-er), n. One who or that which develops or unfolds.

The first developers of jury trial out of the different processes and judicial customs which various races and rulers had imported into this island, or had created here.

Sir E. Crossay, Eng. Const.

Specifically, in photog., the chemical bath in which a sensitized plate or paper is, after a photographic exposure to the light, immersed to develop or bring out the latent image. Developers for the ordinary dry-plate process may be divided into two principal classes, alkaline developers and ferrous-oxalate developers, the first generally employing carbonate of soda or potash in combination with pyrogallol, and the second using oxalate of potash with protosulphate of iron. The results obtained are practically the same with either bath, the latent image in the film being made visible, and the chemical changes induced being fixed, or made permanent in the fixing bath, which follows the developing bath. Many other chemicals may be used in development, either in combination with some of those mentioned above or in independent combinations. See photography.

M. Balaugy claims "that with this chemical he has developed plates without fog in such a light as would have been impossible . . . of every known developer."

development (dê-vel'up-ment), n. [Also development; < F. développement, < developper, develop: see develop + -ment.] 1. A gradual unfolding; a full disclosure or working out of the details of something, as the plot of a novel or a drama, an architectural or a military plan, a financial scheme, etc.; the act of evolving or unraveling.—2. The internal or subjective process of unfolding or expanding; the coming forth or into existence of additional elements, principles, or substances; gradual advancement through progressive changes; a growing out or up; growth in general; as, the development of the mind or body, or of a form of government; the development of the principles of art or of civilization.

A new development of imagination, taste, and poetry.

Channing.

But this word development . . . implies not only outward circumstances to educate, but a special germ to be educated.

J. P. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, 17.

Specifically—3. In biol., the same as evolution: applied alike to an evolutionary process and its result.

Development, then, is a process of differentiation by which the primitively similar parts of the living body become more and more unlike one another.

Huxley, Anat. Invert, p. 30.

4. In math.: (a) The expression of any function in the form of a series; also, the process by which any mathematical expression is changed into another of equivalent value or meaning and of more expanded form; also, the series resulting from such a process. (b) The bending of a surface into a plane, or of all its infinitesimal parts into parts of a plane. (c) The bending of a non-plane curve into a plane curve.—5. In photog., the process by which the latent image in a photographically exposed sensitive film is rendered visible through a chemical precipitation on that portion of the sensitized surface which has been acted on by light. The matter deposited varies with the nature of the process. In the daguerreotype process it is mercury; in negative processes with salts of silver it is silver combined with organic matter.

6. In music: (a) The systematic unfolding, by a varied rhythmic, melodic, or harmonic treatment, of the qualities of a theme, especially in a formal composition like a sonata. (b) That part of a movement in which such an unfolding of a theme takes place.—Altkaline development. See alkaline.—Binomial development. See binomial.—Theory of development. (a) In math., the theory that man's conception of his relations to the infinite is progressive but never complete. (b) In biol., the theory of evolution (which see, under evolution).—Syn. 1. Unraveling, disentanglement.—2. Growth, evolution, progress, ripening.

developmental (dê-vel'up-men-tal), a. [< development + -al.] 1. Pertaining to development; formed or characterized by development: as, the developmental power of a germ.

For, while the plant had first to prepare the pabulum for its developmental operations, the animal has this already provided for it.

W. B. Carpenter, in Grove's Corr. of Forces, p. 421.

2. In biol., the same as evolutionary. The Greek nose, with its elevated bridge, coincides not only with æsthetic beauty, but with developmental perfection.

developmentally (dê-vel'up-men-tal-i), adv. In a developmental manner; by means of or in accordance with the principles of the development theory; as regards development.

I conceive then that the base of the skull may be demonstrated developmentally to be its relatively fixed part, the roof and sides being relatively movable.

Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 171.

developmentist (dê-vel'up-men-tist), n. [< development + -ist.] One who holds or favors the doctrine of development; an evolutionist.

The assumption among religious developmentists is that we cannot have the artistic and literary program without an increased complication of creeds and dogmas, but to that I distinctly demur.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 220.

devanastate, r. t. [< LL. devanastatus, pp. of devanastare, disfigure, deform, < L. de-priv. + LL. venustare, make beautiful, < L. venustus, beautiful, < Venus, the goddess of love and beauty: see Venus.] To deprive of beauty or grace.

Of beauty and order devanastated, and exposed to shame and dishonour.

Watkinson, Apol. for Learning (1653), p. 245.

devoir, n. [*Early mod. E. also devour, < ME. devor, < AF. *devoir, OF. devoir, devoir, F. devoir, debt, duty, homage, < deoir, devoir, F. devoir = Pr. dever = Sp. Pg. deber = It. dovere, owe, < L. debere, owe: see debt, debit, and cf. devoir, a mod. form of dever. Hence endeavor, q. v.*] Duty; obligation.

Than send the kyng Carados, "I wote not what eche of yow will do; but as for me, I will go hym a-ryens, and yet I have nede of socour and helpe, so do ye yours deerr."

Morris (E. E. T. 8), II. 162.

divergence, divergency (dê-vér'jen-si, -jen-si), n. Same as divergence, divergency. [Rare.] diversoir (de-ver'soir), n. [< F. diversoir, < diverser, lean, bend, < devers, bent, curved, < L. deversus, pp. of devertere, turn away, < de, away, + vertere, turn: see verse.] In hydraul. engin., the fall of a dike. E. H. Knight.

divest (dê-vest'), v. [= OF. devestir, F. dévestir = Pr. devestir, devestir = It. divestire, < L. de-vestire (ML. also divestire), undress, < de- (or dis-) priv. + vestire, dress, < vestis, dress, garment: see vest. Cf. divest, the more common form.] 1. To remove vestiture from; undress.

Like bride and groom

Divesting them for bed. Shak., Othello, II. 3.

2. To divest; strip; free.

Then of his arms Androgous he divests,

His sword, his shield he takes, and plumed crests.

Sir J. Denham.

Come on, thou little inmate of this breast,

Which for thy sake from passions I divest.

Prior.

3. In law, to alienate; annul, as title or right; deprive of title.

What are those breaches of the law of nature and nations which do forfeit and divest all right and title in a nation to government?

Bacon.

The rescinding act of 1793 . . . could not divest the rights acquired under . . . [previous] contract.

II. intrans. In law, to be lost or alienated, as a title or an estate.

devery (dê-veks'), a. and n. [< L. deversus, sloping, shelving, orig. another form of deversus, pp. of deversare, carry down; passive in middle sense, go down, descend; < de, down, + versare, carry: see vehicle, etc.] 1. a. Bending down.

Thal love lande devens and inclines.

Palsgrave, Husbondrie (E. E. T. 8), p. 94.

II. n. Same as deversity.

Following the world's deves, he meant to tread,

To compass both the pen, and drink Niles' head.

May, in: of Lucan's Pharsalia, 2.

Deversus (dê-vek's), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. deversus, sloping, steep (see devers); in allusion to the great stature and sloping neck of the giraffe.] A family of ruminants, of which the giraffe is the only living representative. See Giraffidae. Illiger.

deversity (dê-vek'si-ti), n. [< L. deversitas (-t)s, < deversus, sloping: see devers.] A bending or sloping down; incurvation downward. Also devez.

That heaven's diversity [deversity].

Sir J. Davies, Witte's Pilgrimage, sig. N i. b.

deviant (dê-vi-ant), a. [ME. deviant, < OF. deviant, < LL. devian (-t)s, ppr. of deviare, deviate: see deviate.] Deviating; straying; wandering. Rom. of the Rose.

deviate (dê-vi-ât), v.; pret. and pp. deviated, ppr. deviating. [< LL. deviatum, ppr. of deviare (> It. deviare = Sp. desviar = Pg. desviar, desviar = OF. devier, devier), go out of the way, < L. devius, out of the way: see devious.] 1. intrans. 1. To turn aside or wander from the way or course; err; swerve: as, to deviate from the common track or path, or from a true course.

What makes all physical or moral ill?

There deviates nature and here wanders will.

Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 112.

2. To take a different course; diverge; differ. He writes of times with respect to which almost every other writer has been in the wrong; and, therefore, by resolutely deviating from his predecessors, he is often in the right.

Macaulay, Milford's Hist. Greece.

Deviating force. See force.—Syn. To stray, digress, depart, diverge, vary.

II. trans. 1. To cause to swerve; lead astray. A wise man ought not so much to give the reins to his man passions as to let them deviate him from the right path.

2. To change the direction or position of, as a ray of light or the plane of polarization. See biquartz.

deviation (dê-vi-â'shyn), n. [= F. déviation = Sp. devolucion, devolucion = Pg. deviação = It. deviazione, < ML. deviatio (-n-), < LL. deviare, deviate: see deviate.] 1. The act of deviating; a turning aside from the way or course.

These bodies constantly move round in the same tracks, without making the least deviation.

Cheyne.

2. Departure from a certain standard or from a rule of conduct, an original plan, etc.; variation; specifically, obliquity of conduct.

Having once surveyed the true and proper natural alphabet, we may easily discover the deviations from it.

Holder.

The least deviation from the rules of honour introduces a train of numberless evils.

Steele, Tatler, No. 231.

3. In com., the voluntary departure of a ship without necessity, or without reasonable cause, from the regular and usual course of the specific voyage insured. In the law of insurance it includes unreasonable delay on the voyage, as well as beginning an entirely different voyage.

4. In astron., the oscillatory motion of a plane; especially, in the Ptolemaic system, the oscillation of the plane of the orbit of a planet, which was supposed to account for certain inequalities in the latitude.—Conjugate deviation, in pathol., the forced and persistent turning of both eyes toward one side, without altering their relations to each other, seen in some cases of brain lesion. Deviation of a falling body, that deviation from the perpendicular line of descent which is caused by the rotation of the earth on its axis.—Deviation of a projectile, its departure from a normal trajectory.—Deviation of a ray of light, in optics, the change of direction a ray undergoes in passing from one medium to another. (See refraction.) The minimum of deviation, or least change of direction, for a ray passing through a prism, takes place when the angles of incidence and emergence are equal.—Deviation of the compass, the deviation of the north point of a ship's compass from the magnetic meridian, caused by the counter-attraction of the iron in the ship. For ships which are to remain in the same magnetic latitude, this error may be corrected or compensated by placing magnets near the affected compass. (Compasses are frequently elevated above the deck on tripods or masts to obviate the effects of the ship's magnetism, the direction and amount of which depends to a certain extent upon the position of the ship's head with reference to the points of the compass while building. In iron ships a careful determination of this error, with the ship's head on every point of the compass successively, is essential to safe navigation.—Primary deviation, in optics, the deviation of the weaker eye from that position which would make its visual line pass through the object-point of the healthy eye.—Secondary deviation, in optics, the deviation of the healthy eye from the position which would make its visual line pass through the object-point of the weaker eye.

deviator (dê-vi-â-tôr), n. [= F. déviateur, adj., producing deviation; < LL. deviator, one who deviates, < deviare, deviate: see deviate.] One who deviates.

The greatest men of genius . . . do not stand forth in their respective generalities as deviators from the intelactual life of their fellow-men, with an antecedent as well as contemporary separation, but are each the outcome of circumstances. W. Sharp, D. G. Roswell, p. 25.

deviator (dē-vi-ā-tō-rē), a. [< deviate + -ory.]

deviating. Latam. [Rare.]

device (dē-vis'), n. [Early mod. E. also devise; < ME. devise, devyse, devise, deys = D. devies = G. Dan. Sw. devise, < OF. devise, devise, devise, f., devise, devise, m., division, difference, disposition, will, opinion, plan, contrivance, device, F. devise, f., device, motto, devise, m., estimate, also (obs.) chat, talk, = Fr. devise, f., devise, m., = Sp. Pg. It. devise, f., a division, device, < ML. divisa, f., a division, limit, difference, judgment, mark, device, < L. divinus, fem. divisa, pp. of dividere, divide: see devise and divide.] 1. Disposition; desire; will; pleasure.

Yef the knyght be goode, he heth a horse at his device, and I trowe yf he will do all his power that he sholde disounte souhe xx as be here. Morte (A. E. T. A.), iii. 532.

2. Opinion; view.
Certe, as at my device.
There is no place in Paradye
So good inne for to dwell.

3. The act or state of devising or inventing; invention; inventiveness; a contriving.

Your Invention being once devised, take heed that neither pleasure of rime, nor variety of device, do carie you from it. Gaue, Notes on Eng. Verse (ed. Arner), § 2.

Yet he's gentle; never schooled, and yet learned; full of noble device. Shak., As you like it, i. 1.

Much of our social machinery, academic, literary, philosophic, is of his [Franklin's] device.

4. An invention or a contrivance; something devised or fitted for a particular use or purpose, especially something of a simple character or of little complexity: as, a device for checking motion.

Bale tie, a device for fastening the ends of the hoops by which bales of cotton are held in compact form. E. H. Knight.

5. A scheme or plan; something devised or studied out for promoting an end; specifically, something contrived for an evil or a selfish purpose; a wrongful project, stratagem, or trick.

Some witty device and fiction made for a purpose. Puttenham, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 22.
He disappointeth the devices of the crafty. Job v. 12.
His device is against Babylon, to destroy it. Jer. ii. 11.
His [the Attorney-General's] Head is full of Proclamations and Devices how to bring Money into the Exchequer. Hovell, Letters, i. vi. 11.

6. Something fancifully designed, as a picture, a pattern, a piece of embroidery, the cut or ornament of a garment, etc.

And, lo, behold these talents of their hair,
With twisted metal amorously impleach'd,
I have received from many a several fair,
Their kind acceptance weepingly beseech'd. . .
Lo, this device was sent me from a nun,
Or alster sanctified, of holiest note.

7. The representation of some object, group of objects, or scene, generally accompanied by a motto or other legend, and used as an expression of the bearer's aspirations or principles. It is usually emblematic in character, and often contains a puzzle or a very recondite allusion. It differs from the badge and the cognisance in not being necessarily public and used for recognition, although the device, or a part of it, was often used as a cognisance. Book-plates formerly often bore a device, and still occasionally display one. See emblem, impress.

The device of our public seal is a crane grasping a penny in his right foot. Addison, The Tall Club.
Hence—8. The motto attached to or suited for such an emblem.

A youth, who bore, 'mid snow and ice,
A banner with the strange device,
Brook'd it!
Longfellow, Excelsior.

9. A spectacle; a show.
Masques and devices, welcome!
Shirley (and Fletcher?), Coromation.

10. Devil [OF. a devie, a devier, at will, in good order, cholerically; excellently.]

When the two sons of kynge Vrien herde say that the names were passed, that wende to have no devies, and armed hem wile and lepte on horse, and rode out of the castell of randoll, and were four hundred wile armed at devies. Morte (A. E. T. A.), ii. 275.

Overreaching device. See overreach.—Point device. See point.—Wing & Contrivance, Shirley, etc. (see emphatic, n.; see also artifice), wile, ruse, maneuver, trick.—7. Design, symbol.

devilish (dē-vis'fūl), a. [< device + -ful, 1.]

Full of devices; ingenious; cunning; curious or curiously contrived. [Rare.]

To tell the glorie of the feast that day,
The goodly service, the devilish sight.
The bridgromes state, the brides most rich array.

devicefully (dē-vis'fūl-lē), adv. [Early mod. E. also devicefully; < deviceful + -ly.] So as to form a design or device; with skillful or curious arrangement; with artistic skill.

Flowers . . . devicefully being set
And bound up, might with speechless scenery Deliver errands mutely and naturally.

devil (dev'el), n. [*Also formerly devel (devel, etc.), also and still dial. or colloq. diavel (diavel, etc.), and contr. dei, deil, deul, deale, dule, etc.; < ME. devil, devel, deuil, diavel, deuel, contr. deul, dule, dei, etc.; < AS. deofol, deoful, oldest form diabol = OS. diabol = OFries. diabol, drel, = D. duvel = MLG. duvel, LG. diavel = OHG. tiufal, tiural, tiufal, MHG. tiuvel, tiufel, tiufel, tiuvel, G. tiufel = Icel. diöfull = Sw. djävul = Dan. djævel = Goth. diabolus, diabolus, diabolus = OF. diable, deable, F. diable = Pr. diable, diabol = Sp. diablo = Pg. diabo = It. diavolo, < L.L. diabolus, a devil, the devil, = OBulg. diavolǫ, diavolǫ, Bulg. diavol = Serv. dyavo = Bohem. ďábel = Pol. diabol, diabeł (barred l) = Sorbian diabol = Russ. diavolǫ, diavolǫ, devil, < Gr. διάβολος, a slanderer, in New Testament and ecol. use the devil, < διάβαλλεν, slander, traduce, lit. throw across, < διά, through, across, + βάλλεν, throw. Cf. diabolo, etc.] 1. *A false accuser; a traducer or slanderer.

Jesus answered them, Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil? He spake of Judas Iscariot the son of Simon: for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve. John vi. 70, 71.

(This use of the original term diabolos occurs several times in the New Testament (1 Tim. iii. 11; 2 Tim. iii. 8; Tit. ii. 3), but this is the only instance in which, when so used, it is rendered devil in the English versions.)

2. In Christian theology, a powerful spirit of evil, otherwise called Satan (the adversary or opposer): with the definite article, and always in the singular. He is frequently referred to as the Evil One, the prince of the powers of the air, the prince of darkness, Beelzebub, Belial, the tempter, the old serpent, the dragon, etc. He is represented in the New Testament as a person, the enemy of God and of holiness, and bent on the ruin of man, but possessing only limited power, subordinate to God, able to operate only in such ways as God permits, and capable of being made subservient to God's will. In this respect he differs from Ahirman, the evil principle in the dualistic system of the Persians, who was coeval and coordinate with Ormazd, the spirit of light and goodness, and from the devil of the Gnostic and Manichean systems. The medieval conception of the devil was largely derived from pagan mythology.

Then was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. Mat. iv. 1.

Doest thou, in the name of this Child, renounce the devil and all his works?

Book of Common Prayer, Public Baptism of Infants.
Lady M. Are you a man?
Mac. Ay, and a bold one, that dare look on that Which might appal the devil. Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4.

Note, that the climax and the crown of things Invariably is, the devil appears himself!
Armed and accoutred, horns and hoofs and tail!

Browning, Ring and Book, i. 190.

3. [Used in the English versions of the New Testament to translate the Greek δαίμων and δαίμων, a spirit or demon: see demon.] A subordinate evil spirit at enmity with God, and having power to afflict man both with bodily disease and with spiritual corruption; one of the malignant spirits employed by Satan as his agents in his work of evil; a demon. See demoniacal.

gif the Devils that is with inne answer that he schalle lyve, thet keepen him wel. Manderlyle, Travels, p. 301.

He [Jesus] appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils. Mark xvi. 8.

4. A false god; an idol. [In the authorized version of the Old Testament the word devil occurs four times: twice (Lev. xvii. 7; 2 Chron. xi. 15) translating Hebrew aserim, rendered in the revised version "he-gods" or "sacra," and twice (Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. cv. 37) translating Hebrew elohim, rendered "demons" in the revised version. In the New Testament δαίμων, or demon, is in one instance (see extract) rendered "devil" in the sense of an object of gentle worship, an idol, a false god.]

The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God. 1 Cor. x. 20.

5. A person resembling a devil or demon in character; a malignantly wicked or cruel person; a farce or fiendish person: often used with merely expletive or exaggerative force: as, he's the very devil for reckless dash.

When the cristin saugh this grette devell (the gigantic banon king) comynge, thet doutid [feared] for to mete hym, the beste and the moste hardyst of all the cristin boke. Morte (A. E. T. A.), iii. 442.

If Beverley should ask you what kind of a man your friend Acres is, do tell him I am a devil of a fellow—will you, Jack?

6. A fellow; a rogue: used generally with an epithet (little, poor, etc.), and expressing slight contempt or pity: as, a shrewd little devil; a poor devil (an unfortunate fellow). [Colloq.]

Is it not a pity that you should be so great a Coquette, and I so great a Coquette, and yet be such poor Devils as we are?

I am apt to be taken with all kinds of people at first sight, but never more so than when a poor devil comes to offer his service to so poor a devil as myself.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 32.

Why, sure, you are not the poor devil of a lover, are you?

Shirley, The Duenna, iii. 2.

7. As an expletive: (a) The deuce: now always with the article the, but formerly sometimes with the article a, or used absolutely, preceding a sentence or phrase, and serving, like deuce and other words of related import, as an ejaculation expressing sudden emotion, as surprise, wonder, vexation, or disgust. [Low.]

What a devil alls thee?

Doest long to be hang'd?

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iii. 1.

Within. Sir Giles, here's your niece.

Hor. My niece! the devil she is!

Shirley, Love will Find out the Way, iv.

The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare;
But wonder how the devil they got there.

Pope, Prolog. to Satires, i. 172.

(b) Before the indefinite article with a noun, an emphatic negative: as, devil a bit (not a bit).

Compare fend, Scotch fent, in similar use.
It is a fine thing to visit castles, and lodge in inns at a man's pleasure, without paying the devil a cross.

Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, iv. 25.

The devil a good word will she give a servant.

Bess, and FL., Coxcomb, v. 2.

devitrification (dē-vi'tri-fi-kā'shon), n. [< F. dévitrification; as devitrify + -ation. See -fication.] Loss, either partial or entire, of the glassy or vitreous condition, or the process by which this result is attained. The most conspicuous illustration of devitrification is the production of "Kaukau porcelain" from glass by the long-continued action of heat. (See porcelain.) The term devitrification is much employed by lithologists in describing the changes which have taken place in rocks consisting originally, either wholly or in large part, of glass. (See lava and obsidian.) It may be the result of cooling, during which crystalline products have developed themselves in the glass in greater or less perfection; or it may have taken place in consequence of the action of water, either with or without the aid of heat, after the rocks had become solidified. Pressure is also regarded by many as being an agent of high importance. The changes thus indicated may be begun in a rock during its consolidation, and afterward continued under the combined influence of heat, water, and pressure, even to the entire obliteration of its original vitreous character, the result being the production of a purely lithoid structure. The minute forms developed in the process of devitrification, which are incipient crystals, or glass beginning to lose its unidealized character, have received various names from lithologists, according to their shape and manner of grouping. See microlith and globulites.

devitrify (dē-vit'ri-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. devitrified, ppr. devitrifying. [F. devitrifier; as de-priv. + vitryfy.] To destroy or change, either in part or wholly, the vitreous condition of. See devitrification and glass.

Kaaly's ambling down through the Devonian dale.

Drayton, Polyolbion, l. 234.

The term was applied specifically, in geol., by Murchison to a great part of the Paleozoic strata of North and South Devon and used by him as synonymous with Old Red Sandstone, for which term he substituted it, "because the strata of that age in Devonshire—lithologically very unlike the old red sandstone of Scotland, Hereford, and the South Welsh counties—contain a much more copious and rich fossil fauna, and were shown to occupy the same intermediate position between the Silurian and Carboniferous rocks." Later geologists, however, do not use the terms as identical, the conditions under which the strata were deposited being very different.

Devonic (de-von'ik), a. Same as Devonian.

Devon kerseys. See kersey.

devonshire (dev'qn-shēr), v. t. Same as devonshire.

The hours between breakfast and dinner the ladies devoted to dress and study.

Goldsmith, Vicar, II.

They devoted themselves to leisure with as much assiduity as we employ to render it impossible.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 158.

—Syn. Devote, Dedicate, Consecrate, Hallow, destine, set apart. In dedicate and the cognate words devote, devoted, etc., the root idea is always that of a complete mental consecration; thus, devotion (def. 3) is the consecration of the entire mind to God and his worship; and a devout (def. 1) spirit is one entirely absorbed in the worship or service of God. To devote indicates the inward act, state, or feeling; to dedicate is to set apart by a promise, and indicates primarily an external act, to consecrate is to make sacred, and refers to an act affecting the use or relation of the thing consecrated; to hallow is to make holy, and relates to the character of the person or thing hallowed. Thus, we devote ourselves by an act of the mind; we dedicate our lives or property by a more formal act; we consecrate to sacred uses a building not before sacred; and we hallow the name of God, recognizing in it its inherent holy character.

Mysterious and awful powers had laid their unimaginable hands on that fair head and devoted it to a nobler service.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 272.

Let no soldier fly:
He that is truly dedicate to war

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 2.

Now go with me, and with this holy man,
Into the chantry by; there, before him,
And underneath that consecrated roof,
Flight me the full assurance of your faith.

Shak., T. N., iv. 2.

And, from work
Now resting, blest and hallowed the seventh day.

Milton, P. L., vii. 502.

2. Addit, Devote, etc. See addit.

devote (dē-vōt'), a. and n. [ME. devote, < OF. devot, F. dévot = Pr. devot = Sp. Pg. devoto = It. devoto, < L. devotus, pp., devoted: see devote, v. Doublet, devout, q. v.] 1. a. Devoted; devoted.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, i. 1.

2. To disavow; disclaim.

There too the armless angelic devout Their former rage, and all to merrý bow'd.

G. Fletcher, Christ's Victory and Triumph.

dew (dû), n. [Early mod. E. also dewe, dew; *< ME. dew, dew, dew; < AS. dew = OFries. dau = D. dauw = MLG. dew, douwe, dawe, dau, LG. dau = OHG. tau, tau (tauw-), MHG. tau (tauw-), G. tau, tauw = Icel. dagg = Sw. dagg, dew, cf. dagg, drizzling rain, = Dan. dagg, dew (ODan. dagregn, drizzling rain), = Goth. daggs-wus (?), not recorded. From the Scand. is derived E. dag, dew: see dag, deg.] 1. The aqueous vapor which is deposited from the atmosphere by condensation, especially during the night, in the form of small drops on the surface of bodies. The formation of dew is explained by the loss of heat by bodies on the earth's surface through radiation at night, by which means they and the air immediately about them are cooled below the dew-point (which see). Dew is thus deposited chiefly on bodies which are good radiators and poor conductors of heat, like grass; hence also it appears chiefly on calm and clear nights—that is, when the conditions are most favorable for radiation. It never appears on nights both cloudy and windy. In winter dew becomes hoar frost.*

They [in Pers.] haue large and deepe ditches, in which they sow or set, and that which groweth is nourished with the dew.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 573.

Since dew is made of steams of the terrestrial globe, which, whilst they retain that form, and were not yet conuened into drops, did swim to and fro in the air, and made part of it; the phenomena that shew the power of dew in working on solid bodies may help to manifest how copiously the air may be impregnated with subtle saline parts.

Boyle, Hist. of Air, xi.

She . . . wash'd her hands with the dew(s) of heav'n, That on sweet roses fall.

Queen Eleanor's Fall (Child's Ballads, VI. 206).

The dews of the evening most carefully shun,— Those tears of the sky for the loss of the sun.

Chesterfield, Advice to a Lady in Autumn.

2. Something likened to dew: (a) As falling lightly, or as serving to refresh.

Never yet one hour in his bed Did I enjoy the golden dew of sleep, But with his timorous dreams was still awak'd.

Machiavelli, Machiavelli.

dexterous, dextrous (dek'stēr-us, dek'strūs), a. [< L. dexter, right, ready (see dexter), + -ous.] 1. Having greater skill in using the right hand than the left; right-handed. [Rare.] 2. Possessing manual skill; hence, skilful or adroit in the use of the body in general; quick and precise in action.

Whether the Mutilings were slain by our own Men, or the Dutch, I cannot say; for we had some very dextrous thieves in our Ship.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 529.

For both their dextrous hands the lance could wield.

Pope.

3. Having mental adroitness or skill; ready in the use of the mental faculties; prompt in contrivance and management; clever; expert: as, a dexterous manager.

The Coptic . . . are well acquainted with all affairs, are very dextrous at keeping accounts, which they do in a sort of Coptic characters understood by no body else.

Pococke, Description of the East, I. 170.

The dexterous Captains never choose to preach on the life and miracles of a saint, until they have awakened the devotional feelings of their auditors by exhibiting some relic of him, a thread of his garment, a lock of his hair, or a drop of his blood.

Machulay.

4. Exhibiting dexterity, in any sense; skilful; artful; clever: as, dexterous management.

Cicero was also famous for his bows and arrows, and for a dextrous use of that sort of arms.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. 1. 250.

The dextrous use of plausible topics for recommending any opinion whatever to the favor of an audience.

De Quincey, Style, iv.

= Syn. Expert, Skilful, etc. (see adroit), nimble, brisk, agile.

dexterously, dextrously (dek'stēr-us-ly, dek'strūs-ly), adv. With dexterity; expertly; skilfully; artfully; adroitly.

The good parts he hath he will learn to show to the full, and use them dexterously.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 90.

dexterousness, dextrousness (dek'stēr-us-ness, dek'strūs-ness), n. Dexterity; adroitness. Bailey, 1727.

dextrad (dek'strād), adv. [< L. dexter + -ad, toward: see -ad.] To the right hand; to, on, or toward the right side; dextrally: opposed to sinistral.

Any tunicle or skins which should hinder the liver from enabling the dextral parts.

St. T. Brown, Vulg. Err., iv. 5.

2. In conch., dextrorse: applied to univalve shells whose aperture is on the right side when the shell is held in front of the observer with the apex upward and the aperture downward toward him: opposed to sinistral. Most shells are dextral.

dextrality (dek'stral-i-tē), n. [< dextral + -ity.] 1. The state of being on the right side, as opposed to the left.—2. Superiority in strength and facility in action of the right side of the body; right-handedness.

Did not institution, but nature, determine dextrality, there would be many more Scythians than are delivered in story.

St. T. Brown, Vulg. Err., iv. 5.

dextrally (dek'stral-i), adv. By or toward the right side, as opposed to the left; dextrad.

It is a curious fact that the spathes are rolled up indifferently either way—either dextrally or sinistrally—in about equal numbers.

Jour. of Bot., Brit. and Foreign, 1883, p. 237.

dextran, dextrane (dek'strān, -trān), n. [< L. dexter, right, + -an, -ane.] A gum found in unripe beet-root and in molasses, and formed, together with mannite, by the mucle fermentation of sugar. It is a white amorphous substance readily soluble in water, and dextro-rotatory. It has the formula  $C_6H_{10}O_5$ .

dextroery, n. See dextro. Chaucer.

dextrine (dek'strin), n. [= F. dextrine, < L. dexter, right, + -ine.] The soluble or gummy matters, having the general formula  $(C_6H_{10}O_5)_n$ , into which starch is convertible by diastase or by certain acids. It is white, insipid, and without smell, and is remarkable for the extent to which it turns the plane of polarization to the right hand, whence its name. Its composition is the same as that of starch. By the action of hot diluted acids, or of an infusion of malt, dextrine is finally converted into grape-sugar. It is used as a substitute for gum arabic in medicine and the arts. Also called gommeine, moist gum, starch-gum, British gum, and Almas gum.

dextroglucose (dek'strō-glō's kōs), n. [< L. dexter, right (see dextrose), + E. glucose.] Same as dextrose.

dextrogyrate (dek'strō-jī'rāt), a. [< L. dexter, right, + gyratus, pp. of gyrare, turn: see gyrate.] Causing to turn toward the right hand: as, a dextrogyrate crystal (that is, a crystal which in circular polarization turns the plane of polarization to the right). See polarization. Also dextrorotatory.

If the analyzer has to be turned towards the right, so as to cause the colours to succeed each other in their natural order—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet—the piece of quartz is called right-handed or dextrogyrate.

dextrogyrous (dek'strō-jī'rūs), a. [< L. dexter, right, + gyrus, a circle: see gyre.] Gyrate, or circling to the right.

dextro (dek'strō), a. [< L. dextrorsum, uncontracted dextro, toward the right, < dexter, right, + corvus, venter, pp. of vertere, vertere, turn: see vertex, vertice, verso. Cf. sinistral.] Rising from right to left, as a spiralling helix, or climbing plant. (In botany this word is used in opposite senses by different authorities. Bentham, Hooker, Darwin, Gray, etc., use it as above defined. Linnaeus, Braun, the De Candolles, and many others give it the opposite meaning.)

dextrose (dek'strōs), n. [< L. dexter, right, + -ose.] A sugar ( $C_6H_{12}O_6$ ) belonging to the glucose group, which crystallizes from aqueous solution with one molecule of water in nodular masses of six-sided scales. It is readily soluble in water and alcohol, has a taste less sweet than ordinary cane-sugar, and directly reduces alkaline copper solution. It is dextrorotatory to polarized light. Dextrose is widely distributed, being found in most sweet fruits, grapes, raisins, cherries, etc., usually associated with levulose. It also occurs sparingly in various animal tissues and juices, and in excessive quantity in diabetic urine. Dextrose is manufactured from starch in large quantity by the action of sulphuric acid. It is used for making cheap syrup, called glucose syrup, in the manufacture of beer, for adulterating molasses. Also called dextroglucose, grape-sugar, and dextral-sugar.—Rotatory dextrose. See birefract.

dextrotropous (dek'strōt'rō-pūs), a. [< L. dexter, right, + Gr. tpeōs (cf. tpeōs, a turning), < tpeōs, turn.] Turning to the right: opposed to laetotropic. Also dextrotrropic.

dextrous, dextrously, etc. See dexterous, etc.
day (dē), n. [ME. day, daye, die, daie, a maid-servant (sometimes applied to a man-servant) about a farm, a milkmaid, < leel. deigja, a maid-servant, esp. a dairymaid, = Sw. deia, a dairymaid, = Norw. deigja, daie, daie, a maid-servant, usually in comp., as in bu-deigja, a maid in charge of the cattle (bu, household, farmstead, live stock), bakster-deigja, a baker (bakster, baking), rakster-deigja, a maid employed in raking hay (rakster, raking), = ODan. deie, in comp. maikdeigje, milkmaid (maie, milk), munkedje, monk's concubine (munk, monk), etc. Usually referred to leel. deig = Sw. deg = Norw. deig, dough, = E. dough, as if the deigja were orig. a 'baker' (cf. bakster-deigja, above); but there is no evidence of this except the perhaps accidental similarity of form. Among the duties of the dey is mentioned that of feeding the young and weak of a flock or herd with foreign milk; this, in connection with the regular duty of milking the cows, gives some color to the phonetically doubtful derivation from Sw. degga, OSw. dagga, suckle, = Dan. dagge, feed with foreign milk, cede, coddle (prob. not connected with Sw. die = Dan. die, suck, = AS. ppr. "diende, lactantes" (only in Benson's Lex.): see dug). Hence dairy, q. v.] A female (sometimes a male) servant who had charge of a dairy and all things pertaining to it; a female servant in general.

She was as it were a maner deye.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 38.

There my father he is an auld collier,

My mother she is an auld dey.

Lizie Lindsay (Child's Ballads, IV. 65).

The dey or farm-woman entered with her pitchers to deliver the milk for the family.

Scott, Fair Maid of Perth, xxxii.

dey<sup>2</sup> (dā), n. [F. dey, < Turk. day, a maternal uncle, also "a friendly title formerly given to middle-aged or old people, esp. among the Janissaries; and hence in Algiers consecrated at length to the commanding officer of that corps, who frequently afterwards became pasha or regent of the colony; hence, our misnomer of dey as applied to the latter officer" (Redhouse, Turk. Dict.).] The title of the governor of Algiers under Turkish suzerainty from 1710 till its conquest by the French in 1830. From 1600 the deys were the elected chiefs of the Janissaries of the country, who divided power with the pashas appointed by the Porte, and in 1710 superseded them. Tripoli and Tunis were in former times also sometimes ruled by deys, in place of their legitimate beys.

deyhouse (dā'hous), n. [Also dayhouse; < dey<sup>1</sup> + house.] A dairy. [Prov. Eng.]

deymaid, n. See daymaid.

deynet, v. t. An obsolete form of design.

deynous, a. See dainous.

deyntei, deyntee, n. and a. Obsolete forms of deinty.

deys, n. An obsolete form of deis.

desinification (dē-zing'f-i-kā'shon), n. [< de-priv. + sine + (-i)fication.] Separation of sine from a composition or an alloy in which it is present.

desymotize (dē-zī'mō-tiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. desymotized, ppr. desymotizing. [< de-priv. + symmot(ic) + -ize.] To free from disease-germs.

D. F. An abbreviation of the Latin defensor fidei, defender of the faith. See defender.

dft. A contraction (a) of draft, used in commercial writings; (b) sometimes, of defendant.

D. G. An abbreviation of the Latin Dei gratia, by the grace of God.

dha (dā), n. [Burmese.] A measure of length used in Burma; a rod, equal to 154 English inches.

dhabb (dab), n. [Ar. dhabb, a lizard (the skink).] The dried flesh of the skink, Scincus officinalis, used as a medicine.

dhadium (dā'di-um), n. A weight of Ballari in India, one fourth of the Ballari maund, or 6 pounds 5 ounces 8 drams avoirdupois.

dhak (dāk), n. [Hind. dhat, dhat, or dhatkhat (Anglo-Ind. dawk); also called paldea.] A handsome leguminous tree of India, Butea frondosa, the wood, leaves, and flowers of which are used in religious ceremonies. See Butea.

dhal (dāl), n. Same as dhal.

dhales (dāl's), n. A necklace, usually of gold beads, worn in the Levant.

dhamnoo (dām'nō), n. [E. Ind.] A tilaceous tree of India, Grewia elastica, the wood of which is very tough and elastic.

dhan (dan), n. [Hind. Beng. dhan.] A gold and silver weight of Bengal, the 384th part of a tola. It is now, by law, 0.469 of a grain troy, but was formerly 0.585 of a grain.

dhar (dār), n. [Burmese.] The curved sword of the Burmese, also used as a chopping-implement.

The Burmese dropped their lances and dhar, and fled yelling back toward the pagoda.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 421.

dharri (dar'i), n. [Hind. dhart, also dard, a weight (5 seers).] An East Indian unit of weight, always a quarter of a maund, but ranging from 6 to 15 pounds; a stone. Also called dhuddah.

dhauri (dā'ri), n. [E. Ind.] A lythraceous shrub, Woodfordia floribunda, common throughout India. Its long spreading branches are covered with brilliant red flowers in the hot season.

dhobie, dhoby (dō'bi), n. [Hind. dhob, a washerman, < dhob, a wash.] In India and the East, a native washerman. Also dobie, dobee.

In 1877 the introduction of a steam laundry broke the monopoly of the dhoby.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 142.

Dhobie's itch, Tinea circinata, a kind of ringworm common in hot, moist climates. Also called washerman's itch, Indian ringworm, etc.

dhobieman, dhobyan (dō'bi-man), n.; pl. dhobiemen, dhobyen (-men). In the East, a washerman.

[The dhobyman was waiting outside, and in a few moments made his appearance — a black washerman, dressed in cotton.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 110.

dhole (dōl), n. [E. Ind.] A kind of East Indian dog, the wild dog of the Deccan, Canis Dhole (Canis dholemanus).

dukcunensis. It is of moderate size and a rich bay color. It hunts in packs, and is capable of running down large game.

dhol (dōl), n. The East Indian name for Cajanus indicus, or pigeon-pea, a kind of pulse, dried and split, much used in India as a porridge. Also dhal.

dhoney, dhony, n. See dont.

dhotee, dhoty (dō'tē, -ti), n. [Anglo-Ind., repr. Hind. dhoti.] A garment worn by men in India, consisting of a long narrow cloth passed round the waist, then between the thighs, and returned under itself at the waist behind. It is sometimes drawn close in all its parts, and sometimes the parts surrounding the thighs are allowed to hang loosely almost to the knees. Also dhotee, dotee.

dhow (dou), n. An Arab vessel, generally with one mast, of from 150 to 250 tons' burden, employed in trading, and also in carrying slaves from the east coast of Africa to the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea. Also spelled dow.

Dhow.—From Model in South Kensington Museum, London.

dhu (dō). [The common form (erroneously supposed to be the Gael. spelling) in E. works of the Gael. and Ir. dubh (bā scarcely sounded) = W. du, black.] A common element in Celtic local and personal names, meaning 'black'; as in Dhu Loch, black lake; Roderick Dhu, black Roderick (Scott, Lady of the Lake). The proper form (Gaelic and Irish) is dubh (see etymology): Dublin, originally dubh linn, black pool; Irish Dubh-abbainn, a river in Ireland, now called Blackwater (abb, a river).

dhunchoe (dun'chō), n. [E. Ind.] A tall annual leguminous plant of the tropics of the old world, Sebania aculeata. It is cultivated in India for the fibers of its bark, which are used as a coarse substitute for hemp.

dhurra, n. See durra.

dhurries (dūr'is), n. pl. [E. Ind.] A kind of coarse but durable carpeting made in India, usually in fringed squares, without positive patterns or bright colors. See derries.

Dhurrries are made in squares, and the ends often finished off with fringe; the colours are not bright, but appear durable; gaol-dhurrries have no intricate patterns, like those we term "oriental," but are merely intended for rough wear.

A. G. F. Elliot & Jones, Indian Industries, p. 14.

Di. (a) The chemical symbol of the metal dysprosium. (b) [i. c.] An abbreviation of Latin dimidius, half.

di-1. [L. di-: see dis-. Cf. de-.] A prefix of Latin origin, the form of dis- before certain consonants: see dis-. In some words in earlier English the prefixes di- and de- often interchanged; whence in modern English some with original de- have now also or only di-, as disent, while others with original di- have now de-, as desire, desire, etc.

di-2. [L., etc., di-, < Gr. di-, two-, double-, combining form of dic, adv., twice, doubly = L. di, bi = Skt. di- = E. two, etc., < di- = E. two: see bi-2, tri-, two.] A prefix of Greek origin, cognate with bi-2 (which see), and meaning 'two-', 'twofold', 'double', as in dipterous, two-winged, diptych, a two-leaved tablet, diarchy, government by two, etc. In chemistry it denotes that a compound contains two units of the element or radical to which di- is prefixed: as, manganese dioxide, MnO<sub>2</sub>, a compound of one atom of manganese and two of oxygen.

di-3. A prefix of Greek origin, the form of dia- before a vowel. See dia-.

dia-. [L., etc., dia-, < Gr. dia-, prefix, diá, prep., through, throughout, during, across, over, by, etc., orig. **dīya*, < **dīa*, di- = E. two, connected with dic, doubly, and L. di-, di-, apart, asunder: see di-1, di-2, di-3.] A prefix of Greek origin, meaning in Greek, and so, with modifications, in modern speech, 'through, right through, in different directions, asunder, between,' etc.: often intensive, 'thoroughly, utterly,' etc.

diabantite (di-a-ban'tit), n. [Irreg. < diabase (altered as if Gr. diabās (diabarr-), 2d aor. part. of diabainein, go through or over: see diabase) + -ite.] A chloritic mineral found filling cavities in basic eruptive rocks, like basalt and diabase.

diabase (di-a-bās), n. [< dia-, erroneously for di-3, double, + basē.] The form simulates Gr. diabazō, a crossing over, < diabainein, go through or over, < diá, through, + baivō, go: see basin.] The name originally given by A. Brongniart to a rock which Häfky later designated as diorite, which name Brongniart himself adopted in preference to that of diabase. Later (in 1842) Hausmann again introduced the word diabase, and by it designated a variety of pyroxenic rock, occurring in the Harz, and characterized by the presence of chlorite in considerable quantity. At the present time the name diabase is used to designate a crystalline-granular rock, consisting essentially of augite and a triclinic feldspar, with more or less magnetite or titaniferous iron, or both, and occasionally apatite or olivine, to which is added chloritic matter in varying amount. To this chloritic material the name viridite is frequently applied, this being the substance which gives the mass the greenish color which it frequently has. Diabase is one of the rocks included under the popular designation of greenstone, and also under that of trap. It is an altered form of basalt. "The main difference between diabase and basalt appears to be that the rocks included under the former name have undergone more internal alterations, in particular acquiring the diffused 'viridite' so characteristic of them" (Götte, 1895). See greenstone, trap, diorite, and melange.

diabase-porphyrite (di'a-bās-pōr'f-i-rīt), n. See porphyrite.

diabasic (di-a-bā'sik), a. [< diabase + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to, or composed of, diabase.

Limestones, well proved to be of carboniferous age, cut by diabasic eruptives.

Science, III. 702.

diabatorial (di'a-bā-tō-rī-āl), a. [< Gr. diabazō (see lept), offerings before crossing the border or a river, < diabazō, verbal adj. of diabainein, cross over, < diá, across, + baivō, go, = L. venire = E. come.] Passing beyond the borders of a place. [Rare.]

diabetes (di-a-bē'tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. diabazō, diabetes, also a compass, a siphon, < diabainein, make a stride, walk or stand with the legs apart, also cross over, pass through: see diabatorial.] In pathol., the name of two different affections, diabetes mellitus, or persistent glycosuria, and diabetes insipidus, or polyuria, both characterized in ordinary cases by an abnormally large discharge of urine. The former is distinguished by the presence of an excessive quantity of sugar in the urine, and to it there is a strong tendency to restrict the name. Light and evanescent grades of glycosuria are not considered as diabetes, and diabetes frequently have an entirely different etiology. The disease is chronic and generally fatal. Its essential pathology is unknown. It is not an affection of the kidneys, but depends upon the accumulation of sugar in the blood, or glycosæmia. (See glycosæmia.) Diabetes insipidus, or polyuria, is characterized by the discharge of abnormally large quantities of ordinary or watery urine.

diabolical (di-ə-bol'ik), a. and n. [Gr. diabolos + -kal.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to diabetes. 2. Affected with diabetes: as, a diabolical patient. — Diabolical sugar,  $C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$ , the sweet principle of diabetic urine, which often contains from 8 to 10 per cent. of it. It is identical with starch-sugar, grape-sugar, sugar of fruits, etc., the name common to all of which is glucose. See glucose.

II. n. A person suffering from diabetes.

After following a strict diet for two or three weeks, diabetics lose their craving for prohibited articles of food. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL, 571.

diabolist (di-ə-bol'ist), a. Same as diabolical. diablerie, diabliery (di-ə-bol'ē-ri), n. [F. diablerie, OF. diablierie, diablierie = Pr. diabolus = Sp. diablura = Pg. diablura = It. diabolica], devilry, sorcery, < diabli, devil: see devil. Cf. devilry. 1. Mischievousness; wickedness; devilry. 2. Magic arts; incantation; sorcery.

Those were the times when men believed in witchcraft and every kind of diablerie.

J. E. Cook, Virginia Comedians, I, liv.

I pinched my arm to make sure that I was not the subject of some diablerie. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 372.

diabolarchy (di-ə-bol'ār-ki), n. [Gr. diabolos, devil, + archē, ruler, < ἀρχαί, rule.], The ruler of the devils; the chief devil. [Rare.]

Supposing, however, this Satan to be meant of a real angel, there will be no need to expound it of the diabolarchy. J. Oates, Confutation of the Diabolarchy, p. 2.

diabolism (di-ə-bol'iz-m), n. [Gr. diabolos, devil, + -ism, < ἀρχαί, rule.], The rule of the devil. J. Oates. [Rare.]

diabolical, diabolical (di-ə-bol'ik, -i-kal), a. [LL. diabolus, < Gr. diabolos, devilish, < diabolos, devil: see devil.], Pertaining to the devil; partaking of the qualities of the devil; devilish; hence, infernal; impious; atrocious; outrageously wicked: as, a diabolical plot; a diabolical temper.

Which, in other boasts observed,
Doubt might beget of diabolical power
Active within, beyond the sense of brute.
Milton, P. L., ix, 95.

The practice of lying is a diabolical exercise, and they that use it are the devil's children. Ray.

—Syn. See list under devilish.
diabolically (di-ə-bol'ik-ly), adv. In a diabolical manner; very wickedly; atrociously.

So diabolically absurd . . . as to deny that to be . . . vincible unto Christians, which they have renounced in their baptism. Pryme, Historia-Maxima, I, ii (cho.).

diabolicalness (di-ə-bol'ik-les), n. The state or quality of being diabolical; devilishness; atrocity.

I wonder he did not change his face as well as his body, but that retains its primitive diabolicalness. J. Walton, Satire on Ranelagh House.

diabolify (di-ə-bol'if-i), v. t.; pret. and pp. diabolified, ppr. diabolifying. [LL. diabolus, devil, + -fy.] To ascribe diabolical qualities to; treat as a devil. [Rare.]

The Lutheran [turns] against the Calvinist, and diabolifies him. Purinton, Sermons (1847), p. 59.

diabolish (di-ə-bol'ish), adv. [Humorously substituted for devilish, < LL. diabolus, devil, + -ish: see devilish.] Devilish. [Humorous.]

A diabolish good word. O. W. Holmes.

diabolism (di-ə-bol'iz-m), n. [LL. diabolus, devil, + -ism.] 1. The actions or influence of the devil; conduct worthy of the devil.

While thou so hotly disclaimest the devil, be not guilty of diabolism. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i, 14.

2. Possession by the devil.

He was now projecting . . . the farce of diabolism and exorcisms. Warburton, Doctrine of Grace, ii, 223.

3. In occultism, black magic; sorcery; invocation of evil spirits.

diabolism (di-ə-bol'iz-m), v. t.; pret. and pp. diabolized, ppr. diabolizing. [LL. diabolus, devil, + -ize.] To render diabolical or devilish; impart diabolical ideas to. [Rare.]

He [the reformer] should resolve, with all his might, to divinize instead of diabolize public life.

N. A. Rev., CXXVII, 248.

There were two things, when I was a boy, that diabolized my imagination — I mean, that gave me a distinct apprehension of a formidable bodily shape which prowled round the neighborhood where I was born and bred.

O. W. Holmes, Professor, p. 223.

diabology (di-ə-bol'ō-jī), n. [A contr. of diabolology, < Gr. diabolos, the devil, + -logia, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine of the devil; diabolical lore: as, the diabology of Milton's "Paradise Lost." [Rare.]

Remember the theology and the diabology of the time. O. W. Holmes, Med. Humy., p. 224.

diabolus (di-ə-bol'us), n. [LL. diabolus, an accuser, adversary, the devil: see devil and diabolus.] 1. In occultism, the spirit of evil personified; the devil. — 2. [cap.] In soth., a genus of marsupials, containing the urbane dasyurus or Tasmanian devil, Dasyurus or Sarcophilus ursinus.

diabrotic (di-ə-brot'ik), a. and n. [Gr. diabrotois, able to eat through, corrosive, < διαβροτός (diabrotois), eat through, < διά, through, + βροτός (brotois), eat: see broma.] 1. a. Having the quality of corroding; corrosive: as, a diabrotic substance; diabrotic action.

II. n. In med., a corrosive.

Diabrotica (di-ə-brot'ik-ē), n. [NL., < Gr. diabrotois, being able to eat through: see diabrotois.] A genus of phytophagous beetles of the family Chrysomelidae.

They have the claws acutely toothed, the tibiae not sulcate, the front carinate, and the prothorax with two deep impressions. There are numerous new-world species, of rather small size. Their larvae are more elongate than the typical Chrysomelidae, and live underground on the roots of plants. A very common North American species is D. vittata (Fabricius), of a bright-yellow color, the head and two stripes on each wing-cover black, as are the abdomen and parts of the legs; the elytra are punctate in rows. The species is injurious to squashes and allied plants, and is known as the striped cucumber-beetle. D. dorsalis (Linnaeus), another common species, has 12 large black spots on the elytra.

diacatholicon (di-ə-ka-thol'ik-on), n. [NL., < Gr. διά, through, + καθολικός, universal: see catholic.] A kind of purgative medicine formerly in use, compounded of many substances: so called from its supposed general usefulness.

diacoustic (di-ə-kas'tik), a. and n. [Gr. διά, through, + ἡσυχία, in math. sense.], 1. a. In math., belonging to a species of caustic curves formed by refraction. If rays Pm, issuing from a luminous point P, be refracted by the curve AmB, so that the sines of incidence are to the sines of refraction

a. Striped Cucumber-beetle (Diabrotica vittata), and b. D. dorsalis (both natural size); c. larva of D. vittata (line shows natural size).

AB, refracting curve; P, radiant; PmD, PmD, rays refracted at m. CDDH, the envelop of all such rays, is the diacoustic.

In a given ratio, the curve CDDH, which touches all the refracted rays, is called the diacoustic curve, or caustic by refraction. Brande and Cass. See caustic, n., 2.

The principle, being once established, was applied to atmospheric refractions, optical instruments, diacoustic curves (that is, the curves of intense light produced by refraction), and to various other cases. Whewell.

II. n. [In math. sense, from the adj. diacoustic, above; in med. sense, of same formation, with reference to caustic in its literal sense.] 1. In med., a double-convex lens, employed to cauterize a part. — 2. A diacoustic curve. See I.

diacetic (di-ə-sē'tik), n. [Gr. διά, through, + αἷμα, blood.], A liquid having a biting taste, formed by the combination of two acetic-acid radicals with the trivalent alcohol glycerol or glycerin. Also called acetic.

diachenium (di-ə-kē'nī-um), n.; pl. diachenia (-ē). [NL., < Gr. διά, through, + αἷμα, blood.], In bot., same as cremocarp: so called from its resemblance to a doubled achene.

diacholion (di-ə-kō'li-on), a. [Irreg. < Gr. διαχολίον, go through, < διά, through, + χολαί, make room, go.], Passing through.

diachylon, diachylum (di-ə-kī'lon, -lum), n.; pl. diachyles (-lē). [NL., < Gr. διαχύλον, very juicy, < διά, through, + χύμα, juice: see chyle.] In med.: (a) Formerly, an emollient plaster composed of the juices of herbs.

The common plaster called diachylon.

He thought it better, as better it was, to assuage his bruised dignity with half a yard square of balmy diachylon. Burke, A Regicide Peace.

(b) Now, another name for lead-plaster.

diachyma (di-ə-kī'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. διά, through, + χύμα, liquid, juice: see chyme.] In bot., the parenchyma or green cellular matter of leaves: a term proposed by Link, but not in use.

diacid (di-ə-sid), a. [Gr. διά, + acid.] Capable of saturating two molecules of a monobasic acid: applied to certain hydroxids and basic oxids.

diacladis (di-ə-kla'dis), n. Refraction.

diacodium (di-ə-kō'dī-um), n. [NL., < L. diacodium, a sort of medicine prepared from poppy-juice, < Gr. διά, through, from poppy-heads: δία, through; κόδιον, the head, esp. of a plant, a poppy-head.], In med., a syrup made of poppies.

diacoma (di-ə-kō'mā), n. [Gr. διά, through, between, + κόμα, a hollow, < κοίλος, hollow.], In anat., the third or middle ventricle of the brain.

diacomal (di-ə-kō'māl), a. [ML. diaconalis, < LL. diaconus, a deacon: see deacon.] Pertaining to a deacon; of the nature of a deacon's duties: as, the diacomal office; diacomal ministrations.

diacomete (di-ə-kō-mē'tē), a. [LL. diaconus, a deacon, + -ete.] Superintended or managed by deacons. [Rare.]

There should be a common treasury for this one great diacomete church. Goodwin, Works, IV, iv, 120.

diacomete (di-ə-kō-mē'tē), n. [ML. diaconatus = Sp. Pg. It. diaconato, < LL. diaconatus, the office of a deacon, < diaconus, a deacon: see deacon.] 1. The office or dignity of a deacon. — 2. A body of deacons.

diaconia (di-ə-kō'nī-ā), n. pl. [Gr. διακονία, neut. pl. of διακονέω, < διακονέω, a deacon: see deacon.] In the Gr. Ch., the suffrages at the beginning of the liturgy; the deacon's litany. Also called irenica and synapte. See irenica and synapte.

diacomicon, diacomicum (di-ə-kō'nī-kōn, -kum), n.; pl. diacomicae (-kē). [Gr. διακομικός, neut. of διακομικός, < διακομικός, a deacon: see deacon.] In Greek churches, a room, usually on the south side of the bema or sanctuary, answering to the prothesis on the north side. It communicates by a door with the bema, and generally has an outside door besides. Sometimes it is placed in a different part of the church; or there may be two. It is used to contain vestments, sacred vessels, etc., and thus corresponds to the sacristy of a Western church. Other names for it are metatorium and anaphoratorium. The diacomicon and prothesis are found in early times comprehended under the common name of prothesis. See cut under bema.

On the opposite side of the bema was the diacomicon or sacristy. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I, 191.

diacope (di-ə-kō-pē), n. [LL. < Gr. διακοπή, a gash, cleft (MGr. NGr. interruption, cessation), < διακοπέναι, cut in two, < διά, asunder, + κοπέναι, cut.], 1. In gram., same as inceps. — 2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of percid fishes having the operculum notched and tuberculate. There are several large and beautiful species in the Indian seas, some of them upward of 3 feet long. Cuvier, 1817.

3. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816. — 4. In surg., a deep wound, particularly of the skull and its integuments; an incision, a fissure, or a longitudinal fracture. [Rare.]

diacoustic (di-ə-kōs'tik or -kous'tik), a. [Gr. διά, through, + ακουστικός, < ἀκούω, hear: see acoustic.] Pertaining to the science or doctrine of refracted sounds. Also diaphonic, diaphonical.

diacoustics (di-ə-kōs'tiks or -kous'tiks), n. [Pl. of diacoustic: see -ics.] The science or doctrine of refracted sounds; the consideration of the properties of sound refracted by passing through media of different density. Also called diaphonics.

diacranterian (di-ə-kran-tē'ri-an), a. [Gr. διά, through, apart, + κρανίον, the windom-teeth, so called as completing the set, lit. completers, < κραίνω, accomplish, complete.], Having teeth in rows separated by an interval: applied to the dentition of serpents in which the posterior teeth are separated by a considerable interval from the anterior: opposed to synantherian. Also diacranterian.

diacrisiography (di-ə-kris-i-og'ra-fī), n. [Gr. διακρίσις, separation (secretion) (< διακρίνω, separate: see diacritic) + -γραφία, < γράφω, write.], A description of the organs of secretion. Dugliet.

diacritic (di-ə-krit'ik), a. and n. [Gr. διακρίνω, able to distinguish, separate, < διακρίνω, distinguish, separate, < διά, between, + κρίνω, separate, distinguish: see critic. Cf. diacron, diacret, which are of similar formation.], 1. a. Serving to distinguish: same as diacritical (which is the more common form).

II. n. A diacritical mark (which see, under diacritical).

diacritical (di-ə-krit'ik-ly), a. Serving to distinguish; distinguishing; distinctive: as, a diacritical mark, point, or sign.—Diacritical current, in elec., a magnetic current which will produce in an iron coil diacritical magnetization, or a magnetization equal to one-half saturation.—Diacritical mark, point, or sign, a dot, line, or other mark added or put adjacent to a letter or sign in order to distinguish it from another of similar form, or to give it a different phonetic value, or to indicate some particular accent, tone, stress, or emphasis, as in schemes for the transliteration of foreign languages into Roman letters, or for indicating the exact pronunciation of words, as in the scheme of marking pronunciation used in this dictionary. Thus, the marks attached to a in the forms ā, â, ã, are diacritical marks, or diacritics. So in the angular German running-hand the letter u (u) is written thus, ü, to distinguish it from u (u); and the dot over the t, formerly used also over y, has a like office. Diacritical marks and points are regularly used as a part of the alphabetical systems of many languages.

From "t" in the Icelandic alphabet, "v" is distinguished only by a diacritical point.
Johnson, Grammar of the English Tongue.

diact (di'akt), a. A contracted form of diactine.
diactinal (di-ak'ti-nal), a. [diactine + -al.]
Same as diactine.

diactine (di-ak'tin), a. [Gr. di-, two-, + aktis (aktis), a ray.] Having two rays; sharp-pointed at each end, as a sponge-spicule of the monaxon, biradiate, or rhabdus type. W. J. Sollas.
diactinic (di-ak'tin'ik), a. [Gr. di-, through, + aktis (aktis), a ray: see actinic.] Capable of transmitting the actinic or chemical rays of the sun.

diadelph (di'ə-delf), n. [*NL. *diadelphus*: see diadelphous.] In bot., a plant the stamens of which are united into two bundles or sets by their filaments.

Diadelphia (di-ə-del'f-i-ə), n. pl. [NL., < **diadelphus*: see diadelphous.] The name given by Linnaeus to his seventeenth class of plants. It consists chiefly of leguminous genera.

diadelphian (di-ə-del'f-i-an), a. [NL. Diadelphia, q. v.] Same as diadelphous.

diadelphic (di-ə-del'fik), a. [As diadelphous + -ic.] Being one of a group of two.

diadelphite (di-ə-del'fit), n. [Gr. di-, two-, + adelphos, brother, + -ite.] A manganese arseniate occurring in red rhombohedral crystals at Nordmark in Sweden. The name has reference to its close relation to synadelphite and other similar minerals from the same locality. Also called hematolite.

diadelphous (di-ə-del'fus), a. [*NL. *diadelphus*, < Gr. di-, two-, + adelphos, brother.] In bot., having stamens united in two sets by their filaments, the sets being equal or unequal; grouped together in two sets: as, diadelphous stamens.

In papilionaceous flowers, out of ten stamens nine are often united, while one (the posterior one) is free. Also diadelphian.

diadem (di'ə-dem), n. [ME. diademe (= D. diademe = G. Dan. Sw. diadem), < OF. diademe, F. diadème = Sp. Pg. It. diadema, < L. diadema, < Gr. diadēma, a band or fillet, < diadēre, bind round, < di-, through, + deiv, bind, tie.]

1. Anciently, a head-band or fillet worn by kings as a badge of royalty. It was made of silk, linen, or wool, and encircled the temples and forehead, the ends being tied behind, so as to fall on the neck. It was originally white and plain, but was later embroidered with gold or set with pearls or precious stones, and little by little increased in richness until it was developed into the modern crown.
The hair, instead of being arranged in spiral curls over the brow and temples, is twined as if round a concealed diadem.
A. S. Murray, Greek Sculpture, I. 108.

2. Anything worn on the head as a mark or badge of royalty; a crown.

A crown.
Golden in show, in but a wreath of thorns;
Brings dangers, troubles, cares, and sleepless nights
To him who wears the regal diadem.
Milton, P. R., II. 461.

Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains;
They crown'd him long ago
On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds,
With a diadem of snow.
Byron, Manfred, I. 1.

3. Figuratively, supreme power; sovereignty.
What more can I expect while David lives?
All but his kingly diadem be given.
Dryden, Abs. and Achit.

4. In her., one of the arches which rise from the rim or circle of a crown, and support the mound or globe at the top.—5. In zool., a certain monkey, Cercopithecus diadematus.

diadem (di'ə-dem), v. t. [ME. diademen, in pp. used as adj., after L. diadematus, diademed; from the noun.] To adorn with or as if with a diadem; crown.

And David shall be diademed, and dauntless alle oore enemies.
Piers Plowman (O), IV. 444.

Not so, when diadem'd with rays divine,
Touch'd with the flame that breaks from Virtue's shrine.
Pope, Epil. to Satires, II. 222.

Diadema (di-ə-dē-mā), n. [NL., < L. diadema, a diadem: see diadem.] 1. A genus of Crustacea. Schumacher, 1817.

—2. The typical genus of sea-urchins of the family Diadematiidae. D. mexicanus and D. setosum are examples. J. E. Gray, 1825.—3. A genus of nymphalid butterflies. Boisduval, 1832.—4. A genus of Mollusca. Pease, 1868.
diadematis (di-ə-dem'is), n. [NL., < Diadema + -is.] A family of demostichous or regular sea-urchins, order Endoceroidea, represented by the genus Diadema, having a thin test, very long, hollow, fragile verticillate spines, crenulate perforate tubercles, and notched peristome.

Diadematis (di-ə-dem'is), n. pl. [NL., < Diadema + -is.] A family of demostichous or regular sea-urchins, order Endoceroidea, represented by the genus Diadema, having a thin test, very long, hollow, fragile verticillate spines, crenulate perforate tubercles, and notched peristome.

diademed (di'ə-demd), p. a. [diadem + -ed.] In her., surrounded or surmounted by a circle, like a halo or glory: applied to the eagle of the Holy Roman Empire, the two heads of which were anciently bearded to distinguish them from the similar bearings of other princes, which were simply crowned.

diadem-spider (di'ə-dem-spi'der), n. A name of Epeirix diadema, the common garden-spider: so called from its markings. See cut under cross-spider.

diaderis (di-ə-dek'is), n. [NL., < Gr. diadēre, a taking from, succession, relief, < diadēreō, take from, succeed to, < di-, through, + deō, take, receive.] In pathol., a transformation of a disease into another, differing from the former in both its nature and its seat. Dunghison.
Diadochi (di-ad'ō-ki), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. diadochos, pl. of diadochos, a successor, prop. adj., succeeding, < diadēreō, succeed to, receive from another: see diaderis.] The Macedonian generals of Alexander the Great, who, after his death in 323 B. C., divided his empire.

Since the time of Alexander many Jews have been led to settle beyond Palestine, either with commercial objects or attracted by the privileges conferred by the diadochi on the inhabitants of the cities they founded.
Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 760.

Diadochian (di-ə-dō'ki-an), a. [Diadochi + -ian.] Relating to the Diadochi.

Near the marble steps were various remains belonging to a monument of small dimensions and lavish Diadochian ornamentation.
J. T. Clark, Rep. of Amos Expedition, 1881, p. 40.

diadochite (di-ad'ō-ki-tē), n. [Gr. diadochos, a successor (see Diadochi) (in allusion to its relation to the arseniate pitticite or iron sinter), + -ite.] A hydrous iron phosphate with iron sulphate occurring in stalactitic forms of a yellowish-brown color and resinous luster.

Diadophis (di-ad'ō-fis), n. [NL. (Beard and Girard, 1853), < Gr. diadēma, a band or fillet, + ophis, a snake.] A genus of Colebridae, having the head distinct, the body slender with smooth scales, the postabdominal scutella bifid, the subcaudals all divided, the cephalic plates normal, with a well-developed loreal, 2 postorbitals, 2 anteorbitals, and 2 nasals, between which latter is the nostril. The best-known species is D. punctatus, the ring-necked snake, found in many parts of the United States, a very common and pretty snake, quite harmless, of small size, and dark-green color above and yellowish below, with a yellowish ring round the neck. There are several others.

diadrom (di'ə-drom), n. [Gr. diadromos, diadromos, a running through, < diadromēin, run through, < di-, through, + drōmēin, run, second acc. associated with trōpein, run.] 1. A course or passing.—2. A vibration; the time in which the vibration of a pendulum is performed.

A philosophical foot [is] one third of a pendulum, whose diadroma, in the latitude of forty-five degrees, are equal to one second of time, or a sixtieth of a minute. Locke.

diagram, n. See dioretic.

diagramic, a. See dioretic.

diageotropic (di-ə-jē-trop'ik), a. [Gr. di-, through, across, + trōpein, turn, < trōpeō, a turning (< trōpeō, turn), + -ic.] In bot., growing horizontally or transversely to the direction of gravitation.

diageotropism (di-ə-jē-trop'izm), n. [As diageotrop-ic + -ism.] In bot., transverse geotropism; a turning in a direction at right angles to that of gravitation. Darwin.

diaglyph (di-ə-glyf), n. [Gr. diaglyphein, carve through, carve in intaglio, < di-, through, + glyphein, carve: see glyph.] A sculptured or engraved production in which the figures are sunk below the general surface; an intaglio.

diaglyphic (di-ə-glyf'ik), a. [diaglyph + -ic.] Pertaining to sculpture, engraving, etc., in which the design is sunk into the general surface.

diagnose (di-ag-nōs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. diagnosed, ppr. diagnosing. [diagnos-is.] In pathol., zool., and bot., to determine the diagnosis of; ascertain, as a disease, from its symptoms; distinguish; discriminate; diagnosticate.

diagnosis (di-ag-nōs'is), n.; pl. diagnoses (-ēz). [= F. diagnose = Sp. Pg. It. diagnosi = It. diagnosi, < NL. diagnosi, < Gr. diagignōskō, a distinguishing, < diagignōskō, distinguish, discern, < di-, between, + gignōskō (gignōskō), know, = E. know, q. v. Cf. gnosis, gnostic, etc.] Scientific discrimination of any kind; a short distinctive description, as of a plant. Specifically—(a) In pathol., the recognition of a disease from its symptoms; the determination of the nature of a diseased condition. (b) In zool. and bot., a specific characterization; a brief, precise, correct, and exclusively pertinent definition. In this sense diagnosis is nearly synonymous with definition: both differ from description in omitting details or non-essential particulars; but definition may include points equally applicable to some other object, the particular combination of points given making it a diagnosis.—Differential diagnosis, the distinction between two more or less similar diseases or objects of natural history.

diagnost (di-ag-nōst'), n. [diagnos + -ic.] One who diagnoses.

diagnostic (di-ag-nōs'tik), a. and n. [= F. diagnostique = Sp. It. diagnóstico = Pg. It. diagnóstico, < Gr. diagignōskō, able to distinguish, < diagignōskō, a distinguishing: see diagnosis.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to diagnosis; determining a diagnosis; indicating the nature; constituting a ground of discrimination.

The great diagnostic point between amnesic and static aphasia is, that in the former the patient can always articulate the forgotten word when it is suggested to him; in the latter, no prompting or assistance can enable him to enunciate the proper sound.
Encyc. Brit., II. 171.

II. n. 1. In pathol., a symptom of value in diagnosis. Diagnosis are of two kinds: the adjuvant, or such as are common to several diseases; and the special or pathognomonic, which distinguish a certain disease from all others.

2. In zool. and bot., a term or phrase which constitutes a diagnosis; a definition or characterization.

diagnosticate (di-ag-nōs'ti-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. diagnosticated, ppr. diagnosing. [diagnostico + -ate.] To make or give a diagnosis of; discriminate or characterize, as one species or disease from another; diagnose.

Woman as well as man can sell goods, plan buildings, make statues, resolve nebulae, discover elements, diagnosticate diseases, construct philosophies, write epics.
Boardman, Creative Week, p. 220.

diagnostician (di-ag-nōs'tish'an), n. [diagnostico + -ian.] One skilled in diagnosis.

The injured tissue which puts forth an immediate effort at repair is a diagnostician and a doctor on a minute scale.
Mind in Nature, I. 51.

diagnostics (di-ag-nōs'tiks), n. [Pl. of diagnosis: see -ics.] That department of medicine which relates to the study of the symptoms as indicating the disease; symptomatology.

But Radcliffe, who, with coarse manners and little book learning, had raised himself to the first practice in London chiefly by his rare skill in diagnostics, uttered the more alarming words—small-pox.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., II.

diagoneter (di-ə-gom'ē-tēr), n. [Irreg. < Gr. diayen, conduct (< di-, through, + ayen, lead), + metron, a measure.] A kind of electrocope, consisting of a dry pile and a magnetized needle for an indicator, used for ascertaining the conducting power of different bodies. It was first employed by Roese to detect adulterations in olive-oil, which is said to have less conducting power than other fixed oils.

diagonal (di-ag'ō-nal), a. and n. [= F. Sp. Pg. diagonal = It. diagonale = D. diagonaal = G. Dan. Sw. diagonal, < L. diagonalis, < Gr. diagōnē, from angle to angle, diagonal, < di-, through, across, + gonia, a corner, angle.] 1. a. i. In geom., extending, as a line, from one angle to another not adjacent, within any figure.—2. Being in an oblique direction; lying obliquely.—3. Marked by oblique lines: as, diagonal cloth.—Diagonal bellows, in organ-building, a bellows whose two sides are placed at an angle to each other, distinguished from horizontal bellows.—Diagonal band.—Diagonal brace or diagonal tie. See angle-brace (a).—Diagonal cloth, a twilled fabric so made that the diagonal ridges are somewhat prominent and noticeable. Especially—(a) A soft material used as a ground for embroidery, generally made very wide, and dyed in plain colors without pattern. (b) A material for men's wear, especially for coats and waistcoats.—Diagonal couching. See couching, t.—Diagonal plane, in bot., any vertical plane bisecting a flower which is not an anteroposterior plane or at right angles to that plane.—Diagonal point of a quadrangle, one of the three points, other than the points of the quadrangle, where the six lines intersect.—Diagonal scale, a ruler on which is drawn a set of parallel lines marked off into equal divisions by cross-lines, one of the divisions at one extremity of the ruler being subdivided by parallel lines drawn obliquely at equal distances across the parallel. Such a scale facilitates laying down small fractions of the unit of measurement. Thus, if, in the figure, the distance from 0 to 10—one inch—is divided into 10 equal parts, the diagonal which ends at 0 cuts off upon the parallel lines  $\frac{1}{10}$ ,  $\frac{2}{10}$ , etc., inch respectively; the next diagonal cuts off  $\frac{1}{10}$ ,  $\frac{2}{10}$ , etc.—Diagonal triangle, a triangle formed by the three diagonals of a complete quadrilateral, or the three diagonal points of a quadrangle.

II. n. 1. A straight line drawn from one angle to or through another, not adjacent, in any plane or solid figure.—2. Any oblique line.

I moved as in a strange diagonal.

And maybe neither pleased myself nor them.

Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

Specifically.—3. In chess, checkers, etc., a line of squares running diagonally across the board. See chess.—4. Same as diagonal cloth, especially in the United States: a term introduced about 1875.—Dexter diagonal, in math., a diagonal from the upper left-hand to the lower right-hand angle.—Principal diagonal, that diagonal which passes through the angle considered as the first. See determinant, 3.

diagonal-built (di-ag'gō-nal-bilt), a. Built, as a boat, in such a way that the outer skin is formed by two layers of planking at right angles to each other and making an angle of about 45° with the keel, in opposite directions.

diagonally (di-ag'gō-nal-i), adv. In a diagonal direction; crosswise.

The next leaf may be single; stitch it across with double silk diagonally, and cross those stitches with others.

J. Walton, Complete Angler, l. 5.

diagonalist (di-ag'gō-nal-ist), a. [Gr. diagonal + -ist]. Diagonal; diagonalist: contrast as "diagonal contraries," Milton.

diagram (di'g-ram), n. [F. diagramme, < L. diagramma, a scale, the gamut, in music, < Gr. diapapaia (r), that which is marked out by lines, a figure, a written list, register, decree, the gamut, or a scale, in music, < diapapaia, mark out by lines, draw, describe, < diā, across, through, + papaia, write: see gram, graphic.] 1. In geom., a drawing or scheme delineated for the purpose of demonstrating the properties of any figure by observations on the geometrical relations of its parts.

Many a fair precept in poetry is like a seeming demonstration in the mathematics; very specious in the diagram, but failing in the mechanic operation. Dryden.

2. An illustrative figure giving only the outlines or a general scheme (not an exact representation) of the object; a figure for ascertaining or exhibiting certain relations between objects under discussion by means of analogous relations between the parts of the figure.

Dr. Dalton, in his Elements of Chemistry, . . . published a large collection of diagrams, exhibiting what he conceived to be the configuration of the atoms in a great number of the most common combinations of chemical elements.

Watson, Elst, Scientific Ideas, vii. 3.

A diagram is a figure drawn in such a manner that the geometrical relations between the parts of the figure help us to understand relations between other objects.

Clark Russell, Encyc. Brit., VII. 140.

3. In old music, a table representing all the sounds of the system; a musical scale.—Association-diagram. (a) A diagram in which the relative positions of points represent in magnitude and direction the relative accelerations of particles. Also called acceleration-polygon. (b) A diagram in which the accelerations of particles are represented in magnitude and direction by lines drawn from points showing the positions of those particles.—Configuration-diagram, a diagram which shows the relative positions of the parts of a system by means of the relative situations of points, but does not, like a plan, show the forms of different bodies.—Contrast-diagram, a color-diagram showing the relations of contrast between colors.—Displacement-diagram. (a) A diagram in which the relative positions of points represent in magnitude and direction the relative displacements of particles. Better called displacement-polygon. (b) A diagram in which the displacements of particles are represented in magnitude and direction by lines drawn from points showing the positions of those particles.—Force-diagram, a diagram in which the lines of action of forces are represented by lines.—Frame-diagram, a diagram of a frame in which the positions of the axes of the joints are shown by points, while the rigid or elastic connections are shown by lines between the points. Such a diagram of the configuration of the frame is, in graphical statics, united with a diagram of the forces, the latter being so resolved that all the components pass through joints. By means of a second diagram, the frame-diagram is then completed by the addition of the resultant diagram.—Funicular diagram, a diagram in which every joint of a frame is represented by a funicular polygon, and every link in the frame by a line, the side of a funicular polygon or polygon. Also called stress-diagram.—Indicator-diagram, the diagram traced by the steam-indicator. The diagram is a curve having rectangular coordinates of which the abscissas represent distances of piston-travel from the beginning of the stroke and the ordinates pressures at these distances. The area under the diagram measures the total work performed by the piston during the stroke. This work, expressed in foot-pounds, divided by Joule's equivalent, gives the heat-equivalent of the work performed, in British thermal units. (See indicator.) These diagrams may be obtained from nearly all kinds of heat-engines. Also called (with the paper on which it is traced) indicator-card.—Metrical diagram, a figure drawn to scale from numerical data for the purpose of ascertaining the values of other quantities by measurement.—Newton's diagram, a diagram in which the points represent colors, weights attached to points represent luminosities, and collinear points represent colors which can be produced by mixtures of two colors.—Reciprocal diagrams, two diagrams such that to every point of concourse of lines in either corresponds a closed polygon in the other.—Resultant diagram, a line upon a force-diagram showing the direction and position of the resultant of the forces.—Stereoscopic diagrams, a pair of diagrams, perspective representations of a solid diagrammatic figure, intended to be optically combined by means of a stereoscope.—Stress-diagram. Same as funicular diagram.—Velocity-diagram, a diagram defined like an acceleration-diagram by substituting velocity for acceleration. (See also color-diagram.)

diagram (di'g-ram), v. t. [diagram, n.] To draw or put into the form of a diagram; make a diagram of.

They are matters which refuse to be . . . diagrammed, which Logic ought to know she cannot speak of. Carlyle.

diagrammatically (di-g-ram'at-i-kal-i), adv. A shortened form of diagrammatically. [Rare.]

The folds of her skirts hanging diagrammatically and stiffly. Philadelphia Times, April 18, 1886.

diagrammatic (di'g-ram-at'ik), a. [Gr. as if diapapaia, < diapapaia (r), a diagram.] Pertaining or relating to, or of the nature of, a diagram; represented by means of a diagram; consisting of a diagram; more generally, schematic and abstract.

Aristotle undoubtedly had in his eye, when he discriminates the syllogistic terms, a certain diagrammatic contrast of the figures. St. W. Hamilton.

Diagrammatic reasoning, reasoning which proceeds by first constructing a diagram or other visible schema by means of given relations, and then observing in this diagram other relations not made use of, as such, in constructing the diagram.

diagrammatically (di'g-ram-at'ik-i), adv. After the manner of a diagram; by means of a diagram or diagrams; schematically.

diagrammatic (di'g-ram'at-i-k), v. t.; pret. and pp. diagrammated, pp. diagrammating. [Gr. diapapaia (r), a diagram, + E. -ate. Cf. Gr. diapapaia (r), divide by lines, play at draughts.] To represent by a diagram; put into the form of a diagram. Also spelled diagrammatize.

It can be diagrammated as continuous with all the other segments of the subjective stream. Nied, IX. 18.

diagrammeter (di-g-ram'e-tēr), n. [Gr. diapapaia, diagram, + metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the ordinates of indicator-diagrams, 5 seconds long, and used much after the manner of a parallel rule. E. D.

diagraph (di'g-graf), n. [Gr. diapapaia, mark out by lines: see diagram.] 1. An instrument by which persons without knowledge of drawing or perspective can reproduce the figures of objects before their eyes. It consists of a carriage for a pencil governed by a system of cords and pulleys working at right angles to one another, and set in motion by the movement of a pointer, which is passed by the operator, who is careful to keep his eye at a fixed point of view around the apparent outlines of his subject. The pencil describes on the paper the exact motions of the pointer, and thus reproduces the desired object.

2. A combined protractor and scale used in plotting. E. H. Knight.

diagraphic, diagraphical (di-g-graf'ik, -i-kal), a. [Gr. diapapaia, mark out by lines: see diagram and graphic.] Descriptive. Imp. Dict. diagraphics (di-g-graf'ika), n. [Pl. of diagraphic: see -ics.] The art of design or drawing.

diagrydate (di-g-grid'1-āt), n. [diagrydate + -ate.] A strong purgative in which scammony is an ingredient.

diagrydium (di-g-grid'1-um), n. [NL. ML., also diagrydium, < L. diagrydium, < Gr. diagrydion, the juice of a purgative plant, Convolvulus scammonia.] An old commercial name for scammony.

diagrylos (di-g-grid'1-os), a. [L. diagrylos (Martianus Capella), < Gr. diagrylos (Aristides Quintilianus) for dywros, of two members, < di, two, + grylos, limb, member.] In anc. pros., consisting of two members: a distinctive epithet of the pæon or pæonic foot in the form commonly known as the Cretic. — Pæon diagrylos, the ordinary cretic, a pæonic foot of two semia or divisions ( $\frac{1}{2}$  —  $\frac{1}{2}$ ) as distinguished from the pæon epitritus ( $\frac{1}{4}$  —  $\frac{1}{4}$  —  $\frac{1}{4}$  —  $\frac{1}{4}$ ) a compound foot of double the magnitude, divided into four parts. See epitritus and pæon.

diabeliotropic (di-g-hē-l'ō-trop'ik), a. [Gr. diā, through, across, transversely, + E. heliotropic, q. v.] In bot., turning transversely to the light, as the stem or other organs of a plant; pertaining to diabeliotropism.

The movements of leaves and cotyledons . . . when moderately illuminated are diabeliotropic.

Darwin, Movement in Plants, p. 446.

diabeliotropism (di-g-hē-l'ō-trop'izm), n. [diabeliotropic + -ism.] In bot., the tendency of a plant or of the organs of a plant to assume a more or less transverse position to the light.

As all leaves and cotyledons are continually circumnavigating, there can hardly be a doubt that diabeliotropism results from modified circumnutation.

Darwin, Movement in Plants, p. 364.

dial (di'al), n. [ME. dial, dyal, a dial, < ML. dialis, daily (cf. diale, as much land as could be plowed in a day), < L. dies, a day: see diety. From L. dies come also diary, diurnal, journal, journey, etc.; cf. dier.] 1. An instrument for indicating the hour of the day by means of a shadow thrown upon a graduated surface. For dials with a style or gnomon, see sun-dial; for portable dials, see ring-dial, pocket-dial, and seismism.

Read on this dial, how the shades devour

My short liv'd winter's day.

Quarles, Emblems, III. 12.

The shy shadow steals away upon the dial, and the quickest eye can discover no more but that it is gone.

Glanville.

2. The face of a clock or watch, upon which the hours and minutes are marked, and over which the hands move.

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths; in feelings, not in figures on a dial.

P. J. Bailey, Festus: Scene, A Country Town.

Hence—3. A timepiece of any kind; a clock or watch. In the first extract Shakespeare may have meant a portable dial of the kind described below; but in the second a watch of some kind seems to be clearly indicated.

And then he drew a dial from his poke;
And looking on it with lack-lustre eye,
Says, very wisely, "It is ten o'clock;
Thus we may see," quoth he, "how the world wags."

Shak., As You Like It, II. 7.

Then my dial goes not true. Shak., All's Well, II. 5.

4. Any plate or face on which a pointer or an index moves, marking revolutions, pressure, etc., according to the nature of the machinery of which it forms part: as, the dial of a steam-gauge, gas-meter, or telegraphic instrument.—5. In teleg. and horol., an insulated stationary wheel exhibiting upon its face letters, numerals, or other characters.—6. The lettered or numbered face-plate of a permutation-lock.—7. A mariners' compass. [Rare.]

We are not to Ceres so much bound for Bread . . .

As (Signior Flauto) to thy witty trail.

For first inventing of the Sea-mans Dial.

Spectator, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

8. In mining, a compass or graduated circle with a magnetic needle, arranged for underground surveying where great accuracy is not required. [Eng.].—9. A lapidaries' instrument for holding a gem while it is being cut. It carries the dop to which the gem is directly fixed.—Antwerp dial. See aristarch.—Catoptric dial. See catoptric.—Center of a dial. See center.—Cylindrical dial, a dial drawn on a cylindrical surface.—Declining dial, a dial the plane of which intersects the horizon in a line not directed to a cardinal point; a dial the surface of whose plane is neither east, west, north, nor south. Also called declinator.—Direct dial, a dial the surface of whose plane is east, west, north, or south.—East dial, a direct dial which is exposed toward the east.—Equatorial dial. Same as equinoctial dial.—Equinoctial dial, a dial whose plane is perpendicular to the earth's axis.—Fixed dial, a dial whose plane is vertical.—Fixed dial, a dial which is intended to have a fixed position, and to show the time by means of the hour-angle of the sun or moon.—Horizontal dial, a dial the plane of which is horizontal.—Inclined dial, a dial the plane of which leans forward so that a plumb-line dropped from the upper part will fall outside the wall.—Meridian line on a dial, See meridian.—Night or nocturnal dial, a dial for showing the time by means of the moon's shadow, a rough calculation from the moon's age being used.—North dial, a direct dial exposed to the north.—Phosphorescent dial, a dial made of enameled paper or thin cardboard, and covered with varnish or a solution of white wax in turpentine, over which is dusted powdered sulphid of barium. Such a dial is luminous in the dark, so that it can be read without a light. It loses its phosphorescence after a time, but this may be restored by exposure to sunlight or to the flame of magnesium-wire.—Polar dial, a dial the plane of which passes through the pole of the heavens. Such a dial presents the peculiarity that its center is at infinity.—Portable dial, a dial used as a pocket-timepiece. If such a dial is provided with a magnetic or solar compass, it shows the time on the same principle as the fixed dial; but if there is no such compass, as when such dials were in common use there generally was not, the time is only roughly shown by the altitude of the sun.—Pyramidal dial, a dial whose plane is parallel or perpendicular either to the plumb-line or to the earth's axis.—Quadrantal dial, a portable dial in the shape of the quadrant, with different graduated circles to be used in different months of the year.—Reclining dial, a dial whose plane is not vertical, but leans backward so that a plumb-line can be let fall to a point on the lower part from a point outside the body on which the dial is drawn.—Reflecting dial, a dial which marks the time by means of a spot of light thrown upon it from a mirror.—Refracting dial, a dial which uses refracted light.—Secondary dial, a dial not primary.—South dial, a direct dial intended to be exposed to the south.—Tide-dial, an instrument for showing the state of the tide.—Universal dial, a dial having an adjustable gnomon, for use in all latitudes.—Vertical dial, a dial whose plane is vertical.—West dial, a direct dial intended to be exposed to the west.

dial (dī'al), v. t.; pret. and pp. dialed or dialled, ppr. dialing or dialling. [< dial, n.] 1. To measure with or as if with a dial; indicate upon or as if upon a dial.

Hours of that true time which is dialled in heaven.

Talford.

2. In mining, to survey with the aid of the dial or miners' compass, as a mine or underground workings. [Eng.]

dial-bird (dī'al-bērd), n. [< dial, an acorn. E. form of its native name dahli, q. v., + bird¹.] A bird of the genus Copcechus; a magpie-robin. The name is extended to the whole of the genus, from the native name of the best-known species, the dahli or daly (Copcechus caudatus) of India. There are several species of Asia, the East Indies, and Africa. The dial-bird of the Seychelles in the Indian ocean, C. seychellarum, is peculiar to the islands whence it takes its specific name. It is about as large as a blackbird, black in color, with large white wing-spots. See under Copcechus.

dialect (dī'al-ekt), n. [< F. dialecte = Sp. Pg. dialecto = It. dialetto = G. dialect = D. Dan. Sw. dialekt, < L. dialectos or dialectus, < Gr. διάλεκτος, discourse, discussion, common language or talk, speech, way of talking, language of a country, esp. the dialect of a particular district, < dialyein, discourse, discuss, argue, use a dialect or language, act. dialyein, distinguish, choose between, < dia, between, + lyein, choose, speak. Cf. dialogue, from the same source.] 1. Language; speech; mode of speech; manner of speaking.

O sacred Dialect! in these the names
Of Men, Towns, Countries register their fames
In brief abridgement.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., Babylon.

If the conferring of a kindness did not bind the person upon whom it was conferred to the returns of gratitude, why, in the universal dialect of the world, are kindnesses still called obligations?

South.

His style is a dialect between the familiarity of talking and writing, and his letter such as you cannot distinguish whether print or manuscript.

Steele, Tatler, No. 178.

2. One of a number of related modes of speech, regarded as descended from a common original; a language viewed in its relation to other languages of the same kindred; the idiom of a district or class, differing from that of other districts or classes. Thus the Scotch is a dialect of English; English is a dialect of the Germanic or Teutonic group; Germanic speech is an Aryan or Indo-European dialect. Of the various dialects of Greek—Attic, Ionic, Doric, Æolic, and so on—the Attic finally became the common dialect of all cultivated Greeks. Every literary language is originally one of a body of related dialects, to which favoring circumstances have given vogue and general acceptance.

The Dane was converted; he sank into the general mass of Englishmen; his tongue became simply one of the local dialects of English. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 152.

3. The idiom of a locality or class, as distinguished from the generally accepted literary language, or speech of educated people.—4. Dialectic; logic.

Logique, otherwise called dialect (for thei are both one) is an art to trie the curme from the chaffe, the truth from every falshod. Sir T. Wilson, Rule of Reason (1655).

Æolic dialect, Attic dialect, common dialect, cyclic dialect, etc. See the adjectives.—Doric dialect. See Doric, n.—Æolismic dialect. See common dialect.

under common.—Fig. 1 to 2. Idiom, Diction, etc. (see language), tenue, phraseology.
dialect (dī'al-ekt), v. t. [< dialect, n.] To make dialectal.

By corruption of speech they false dialect and mis-sound it. Neake, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 166).

dialectal (dī'al-ek'tal), a. [< dialect, n., + -al.] Of or belonging to a dialect; relating to or of the nature of a dialect; as, 'cauld' is a dialectal (Scotch) form of 'cold'; the dialectal varieties of Italian.

dialectally (dī'al-ek'tal-lī), adv. In dialect; as a dialect.

Common dialectally in Cumberland and Westmoreland. Knaye, Brit., XXII. 288.

dialectic (dī'al-ek'tik), a. and n. [< L. dialecticus, < Gr. διάλεκτικός, belonging to disputation, < dialaxo, discourse, discussion, disputation (the sense 'belonging to a dialect' is modern, < dialect + -ic): see dialect.] I. a. 1. Relating to the art of reasoning about probabilities; pertaining to scholastic disputation. Kantians sometimes use the word in the sense of pertaining to false argumentation.

Master of the dialectic sciences, so able to guide our reason, and in the discovery of truth, and fix the understanding in possession of it.

Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 237.

2. Of or pertaining to a dialect or dialects; dialectal.

Even languages of so limited area as the Basque in the Pyrenees, as some of the tongues in the Caucasus, have their well-marked dialectic forms.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 175.

Practically they [English and Dutch] have become two languages. They have passed the stage of dialectic difference. They are for practical purposes mutually unintelligible. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 76.

Also dialectical.

Dialectic Methodists. See Methodist.

II. n. [= F. dialectique = Sp. dialectica = Pg. dialectica = It. dialectica = G. Dan. Sw. dialektik, < L. dialectica, < Gr. διάλεκτική (so τήν), the dialectic art, the art of discussion, logical debate, also the logic of probabilities, fem. of διάλεκτικός, belonging to disputation: see I.] 1. Logic, or a branch of logic; specifically, the art of critical examination into the truth of an opinion; inductive logic applied to philosophy; the logic of probable reasoning; the art of discussion and of disputation; logic applied to rhetoric and refutation. The invention of the art of dialectic is attributed to Zeno the Eleatic, whose arguments against motion are examples of the original meaning of the Greek word. The famous dialectic of Socrates and Plato, their chief instrument of philosophical inquiry, was a conversational discussion with inductive appeals to special instances. Dialectic was limited by Aristotle to logic accommodated to the uses of the rhetorician, appealing only to general belief, but not to first principles. The Stoics, who probably introduced the term logic, divided that art into rhetoric and dialectic, the former being the art of continuous discourse, the latter that of discussion with an interlocutor. Cicero and other Latin writers, influenced by Stoic doctrine, understand by dialectic "the art of discussing well" (ars bene disserendi). It thus became the name of that branch of the trivium of the Roman schools which we call logic, and retained that meaning throughout the middle ages. Hence, in all the earlier English literature, it is the synonym of logic, differing from that word only by a more distinct suggestion of the idea of disputation. Modern logicians have frequently restricted it to the doctrines of the Topics and Sophistical Elenchi, or to the logic alone. It has also been used as a synonym of epistémologie. Kant named the constructive part of his Transcendental Logic transcendental analytic, and the destructive part transcendental dialectic. For the sake of this phrase, he makes dialectic, in general, the theory of fallacies. According to Hegel, each concept in the development of thought by a primitive necessity develops its own diametrical opposite, and to this reaction of thought against itself, regarded not as final, but as subject to a subsequent reconciliation in a higher order of thought, he gave the name of dialectic.

There hath not been, to my understanding, sufficiently inquired and handled the true limits and use of reason in spiritual things, as a kind of divine dialectic.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 264.

We termed Dialectic in general a logic of appearance. This does not signify a doctrine of probability; for probability is truth, only conigned upon insufficient grounds, and though the information it gives us is imperfect, it is not therefore deceitful. Kant, tr. by McKeljohn.

St. Paul, though bred in the dialectics of the Greek schools, came late by his conversion to the new faith, and remained a Jew to the last. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 59.

It remains true that the value of the Dialectic which asks and gives such an account of ideal good as at once justifies and limits obedience to practical authorities is conditional upon its finding in the individual a well-formed habitual morality.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 288.

3. Skill in disputation. Also dialectics.
dialectical (dī'al-ek'ti-kal), a. 1. Same as dialectic, I.

A dialectical syllogism is nothing more than a syllogism generating opinion, or any other amount besides science. Burgesius, tr. by a Gentleman.

The flow of wit, the dash of repartee, and the dialectical brilliancy of some of the most famous comic scenes in Shakespeare and Ben Jonson.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 150.

I know very well that you like to amuse yourself with dialectical gymnastics, but I do not care about talking for talking's sake, and have no talent for badinage.

Alcott, Nature and Thought, p. 28.

Intellectual courage and a certain dialectical skill are united with a surprising ignorance of the complexity of the problems attacked.

E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 159.

2. Same as dialectic, 2.

Schultens supposes that we have the book of Job as it was penned at first without any translations, as at that time the Hebrew and Arabic language was the same, with a small dialectical variation only.

Hedges, On Job, Preliminary Discourse.

Dr. Johnson was scarcely at all aware of the authenticity of ancient dialectical words, and therefore seldom gives them any place in his dictionary.

Pope, Anecdotes of the Eng. Lang.

Dialectical disputation, sylogism, etc. See the nouns.

dialectically (dī'al-ek'ti-kal-lī), adv. 1. Logically.

Theory you may not find dialectically sustained, but you are sure to glean facts which will be useful to your own generalizations.

Quarterly Rev., CXIX. 242.

The evolution of thought is the evolution of being—a maxim dialectically good but practically weak.

H. Calderwood, New Princeton Rev., III. 27.

2. In the manner of a dialect; in regard to dialect.

Two coins, differing dialectically in their inscriptions, were found in the Tigris in 1812, and are now in the British Museum.

Knaye, Brit., XVII. 641.

dialectician (dī'al-ek'ti-shi-an), n. [= F. dialecticien; as dialectic + -ian.] One skilled in dialectic; a logician; a master of the art of discussion and disputation.

This was a logic which required no subtle dialectician to point and enforce.

De Quincy, Emerson, III.

Let us see if doctors or dialecticians will dare to dispute my definitions.

Longfellow, Golden Legend, vi.

dialecticism (dī'al-ek'ti-shi-izm), n. [< dialectic + -ism.] Dialectal speech or influence; the characteristics or nature of dialect; a dialectal word or expression.

Dialecticism, phoneticism, ellipsis, and so forth.

The Atlantic, Jan. 14, 1889, p. 27.

dialectics (dī'al-ek'tiks), n. [Pl. of dialectic: see -ics.] Same as dialectic, 2.

dialectologer (dī'al-ek'tol-ō-jēr), n. [< dialectology + -er.] One versed in or engaged in the study of dialectology.

The good custom has been established of giving them [popular tales] in the vernacular of the narrators. And in this way the compilers themselves have been forced to become dialectologers.

Quoted by J. A. H. Murray, in 8th Ann. Add. to Philol. Soc.

dialectological (dī'al-ek'tol-ō-jī-kal), a. Of or pertaining to dialectology; as, a dialectological introduction.

dialectologist (dī'al-ek'tol-ō-jist), n. [< dialectology + -ist.] A dialectologist.

The dialectologist must be fastidious indeed who would not be satisfied with this extraordinary mass of material, where he can only study both form and phonetics for almost every shading of every dialect belonging to the group.

Amer. Jour. Philol., IV. 490.

dialectology (dī'al-ek'tol-ō-jī), n. [< Gr. διάλεκτος, a dialect, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of philology which examines the nature and relations of dialects.

The paramount importance of dialectology for the proper discrimination and classification of any set of language-elements is now generally recognized, and constitutes the most striking difference between the leading drift of language-study to-day and ten to fifteen years ago.

Amer. Jour. Philol., IV. 488.

dialector (dī'al-ek'tor), n. [Irreg. (as if L.) < dialect.] One skilled in dialectics; a dialectician. Imp. Diet.

dialer, dialler (dī'al-ēr), n. In mining, one who uses a dial. See dial, 8.

dialing, dialling (dī'al-ing), n. [Verbal n. of dial, v.] The art of constructing dials; the science which explains the principles of measuring time by the sun-dial; gnomonics.

This hypothesis may be tolerated in physics, as it is not necessary in the art of dialing or navigation to mention the true system or earth's motion.

Sp. Bertholey, Siris, § 285.

Dialing, sometimes called gnomonics, is a branch of applied mathematics which treats of the construction of sundials: that is, of those instruments, either fixed or portable, which determine the divisions of the day by the motion of the shadow of some object on which the sun's rays fall.

Knaye, Brit., VII. 155.

Dialing lines or style, graduated lines placed on rulers, or the edges of quadrants and other instruments, to facilitate the construction of dials.—Dialing sphere, an instrument made of brass, with several concentric sliding over one another upon a movable horizon, serving to demonstrate the nature of spherical triangles, as well as to give the true line of drawing dials on all sorts of planes.

dialist (dī'al-ist), n. [< dial + -ist]. A constructor of dials; one skilled in dialing.

Scientific dialists, by the geometric considerations of lines, have found out rules to mark out the irregular motion of the shadow in all latitudes, and on all planes.

J. Moore, Mechanical Dialing.

diallage (dī'al-g-lage), n. [< Gr. διάλλαγή, interchange, a change, difference, < διάλλω, interchange, change, make different, < διά, between, + ἄλλω, change, < ἄλλω, other]. 1. In rhet., a figure of speech by which arguments are placed in various points of view, and then brought to bear all upon one point.—2. A variety of pyroxene, commonly of a green color, characterized by its lamellar or foliated structure. As formerly used, the term covered metalloidal diallage or bronsite, also schillerspar and hypersthene.

diallel (dī'al-lē), a. [< Gr. διάλληλος, through one another, < διά, through, + ἄλλω, gen. pl. of one another. See parallel]. Meeting and intersecting, as lines; crossing; not parallel. E. Phillips, 1708.

diallel (dī'al-lē), n.; pl. diallels (-lēs). [< Gr. διάλληλος, neut. of διάλληλος; see diallel, diallelus]. In logic, a tautological definition; a definition which contains the word defined; the definition of a term by means of another which is itself defined by means of the first; definition in a circle.

The ancients called the circular definition . . . by the name of diallelus, as in this case we declare the definition and the definition reciprocally by each other (δὲ ἀλλήλων). Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, xiv.

diallelus (dī'al-lē-lus), a. [< Gr. διάλληλος, through one another; see diallel, diallelus]. In logic, involving the fallacy of reasoning or defining in a circle—that is, the proving of one position by assuming another identical with it, or defining two things each by the other.

diallelus (dī'al-lē-lus), n.; pl. dialleli (-li). [< Gr. διάλληλος, through one another; διάλληλος, argument in a circle; see diallel]. In logic, a circle in proof; an attempt to prove one proposition by another which is itself proved only by the first.

The proposition which we propose to prove must not be used as a principle for its own probation. The violation of this rule is called the . . . diallelus.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, xiv.

dialler, dialling. See dialer, dialing.

dial-lock (dī'al-lok), n. A lock provided with one or more dials, each with a hand or pointer connected with the mechanism of the lock in such a way that the bolt will not move unless the hands are set in a particular manner.

diallogite, n. See dialogite.

dially (dī'al-ly), n. [< dial + ally]. See ally. dialogic, dialogical (dī'al-ōj-ik, -i-kal), a. [< F. dialogique = Pg. It. dialogico, < Gr. διάλογος, < διάλογος, discourse; see dialogue]. Pertaining to or partaking of the nature of a dialogue; dialogistic. Burton.—Dialogic method, the method of the Socratic dialogue, in which the teacher asks the learner such questions as to direct his understanding to the recognition of the truth.

dialogically (dī'al-ōj-i-kal-i), adv. In the manner of a dialogue; dialogistically. Goldsmith.

dialogism (dī'al-ōj-izm), n. [< F. dialogisme = Sp. Pg. It. dialogismo, < L.L. dialogismos, < Gr. διάλογος, consideration, < διάλογος, consider, converse; see dialogue]. 1. In rhet.: (a) Deliberation or discussion with one's self, as in soliloquy, of what course to pursue. (b) Introduction into an oration of two or more persons as engaged in dialogue.

Enlarging what they would say by bold and unusual metaphors, by their dialogisms and colloquia.

D. Stead, Twelve Minor Prophets, Pref. (1889).

2. A necessary inference having a single premise and a disjunctive conclusion: as, Enoch and Elijah did not die; hence, either Enoch and Elijah were not men, or some men do not die.

dialogist (dī'al-ōj-ist), n. [< F. dialogiste = Sp. dialogista = Pg. It. dialogista, < L.L. dialogista, < Gr. διάλογος, a converser, < διάλογος, converse; see dialogue]. 1. A speaker in a dialogue.

The like doth Cicero assert in many places, sometimes in the persons of his dialogists, sometimes according to his own sense. Barrow, Sermons, II. viii.

2. A writer of dialogues.

I am very far from conceitously insinuating that this dialogist is the only person who hath managed the dispute I speak of with others.

F. Bacon, Deum Revealed, Pref.

dialogistic, dialogistical (dī'al-ōj-istik, -i-kal), a. [< dialogist + -ic, -ical]. Having the form of a dialogue; consisting in dialogue.

dialogistically (dī'al-ōj-istik-i), adv. In the manner of a dialogue.

In his prophesy, he [Malachi] proceeds most dialogistically. Sp. Richardson, Observations on Old Test., p. 440.

dialogite (dī'al-ōj-it), n. [< Gr. διάλογος, doubt, + -ite]. A mineral of a rose-red color, which crystallizes in rhombohedrons and related forms, and also occurs massive with rhombohedral cleavage. It is a carbonate of manganese. Sometimes erroneously spelled dallogite. Also called rhodochroite.

dialogue (dī'al-ōj-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dialogued, ppr. dialoguing. [< F. dialoguer = Sp. dialogar = Pg. dialogar = It. dialogare, < Gr. διάλογος, consider, converse, < διάλογος, a conversation, < διάλογος, a conversation, enumeration; see dialogue]. To discourse in dialogue. Also spelled dialogies. Richardson.

dialogue (dī'al-ōj), n. [< ME. dialoge, miswritten dialoke, = D. dialoog = G. Dan. Sw. dialog, < F. dialogue = Sp. dialogo = Pg. It. dialogo, < L. dialogus, < Gr. διάλογος, also dialogy, a conversation, dialogue, < διάλογος, converse; see dialect]. 1. A conversation between two or more persons; a colloquy; a talk together.

So pass'd in pleasing dialogue away
The night; then down to short repose they lay.
Pope, Ode on the Death of an Old Peer, vi.

Specifically.—2. A literary work in the form of an imaginary conversation or discussion.—(a) Used as the means of conveying views or opinions: as, the Dialogues of Plato.

The [Greek] philosophers adopted the form of dialogue, as the most natural mode of communicating knowledge. Macaulay, History.

(b) Used as part of a play to be acted, or to be spoken as a school exercise.

dialogue (dī'al-ōj), v.; pret. and pp. dialogued, ppr. dialoguing. [< dialogue, n.] 1. Intrans. To discourse together; converse; talk; confer.

Far. Serv. How dost, fool?

Apem. Dost dialogue with thy shadow?

Far. Serv. I speak not to thee. Shak., T. of A., II. 2.

II. trans. To express as in dialogue; put in the form of a dialogue.

And dialogued for him what he would say,
Ask'd their own wills and made their wills obey.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, I. 182.

Dialonian (dī'al-ōn-i-an), n. [< Dial (see def.) + -onian, as in Babylonian, etc.]. An inhabitant of the Seven Dials, a locality in London long noted for its misery and crime.

The editors of the "Times" and the "Daily News" . . . should know these who can tell them what the Dialonians feel and what the outcasts in the New Cut suffer.

Contemporary Rev., I. 670.

dial-plate (dī'al-plāt), n. 1. The plate of a dial, on which the lines are drawn to show the hour or time of the day.—2. The face of a clock or watch, on which the time of the day is shown.—3. Any kind of index-plate.

dial-resistance (dī'al-rē-sis-tans), n. In elect., a set of resistance-coils arranged in the circumference of a circle, so that they may be thrown into the circuit by moving an arm attached to the center of the dial.

dial-telegraph (dī'al-tel-ē-graf), n. A telegraph in which the receiving and transmitting instruments have the letters of the alphabet arranged on the circumference of a circle. The mechanism is so arranged that when a movable index on the transmitter points to any letter, the index of the receiver points to the same.

dial-wheel (dī'al-hwēl), n. One of those wheels placed between the dial and the pillar-plate of a watch. Also called minute-wheel.

dial-work (dī'al-wērk), n. The motion-work of a watch between the dial and the movement-plate.

dialycarpous (dī'al-i-kār-pus), a. [< NL. dialycarpus, irreg. < Gr. διάλυρος, separate, + καρπός, fruit]. In bot., bearing fruit composed of separate carpels: same as apocarpous.

Dialypetalum (dī'al-i-pet-ā-lis), n. pl. [< NL. fem. pl. of dialypetalus; see dialypetalous]. In bot., same as Polypetalum.

dialypetalous (dī'al-i-pet-ā-lis), a. [< NL. dialypetalus, irreg. < Gr. διάλυρος, separate, + πέταλον, a leaf (mod. bot. a petal)]. In bot., same as polypetalous.

dialyphyllous (dī'al-i-fil-lis), a. [< NL. dialyphyllus, irreg. < Gr. διάλυρος, separate, + φύλλον = L. folium, a leaf]. In bot., composed of separate leaves: applied to a polysepalous calyx or a polypetalous corolla.

diapnebia, a. See diapnebia.

diapnebia (dī'al-i-ē-ē), n. [< diapnebia + -ia]. In chem., the product removed from a solution by dialysis.

diapnebia, v. t. See diapnebia.

diapnepalous (dī'al-i-sep-ā-lus), a. [< NL. diapnepalus, irreg. < Gr. διάπηνος, separate, + NL. sepalum, a sepal]. In bot., having a calyx composed of separate sepals; polysepalous.

dialyser, n. See dialyser.

dialysis (dī'al-i-sis), n. [< L.L., a separation (rhet.), < Gr. διάλυσις, a separation, breaking up, dissolution, dissolving, dialysis, < διάλυσις, separate, dissolve, < διά, apart, + λύω, loose, dissolve. Cf. analysis, paralytic]. 1. In gram.: (a) Division of one syllable into two; dieresis. (b) In Latin grammar, specifically, resolution of the semivowels j and v (i. e., y and w) into the corresponding vowels i and u respectively.—2. In rhet.: (a) Interruption of a sentence by a clause independent of it in construction; parenthesis. (b) Succession of clauses without connectives; asyndeton. Also called dialyton.—3. In anat., separation of parts in general; dissolution of continuity of parts previously united.—4. In med., loss of strength; weakness of the limbs.—5. In chem., the act or process of separating the soluble crystalloid substances in a mixture from the colloid, depending on the principle that soluble crystalloid bodies will diffuse readily through a moist membrane, while colloids diffuse very slowly, if at all. This is done by pouring a mixed solution of crystalloid and colloid on a sheet of parchment-paper stretched over a wooden or gutta-percha hoop, having its edges well drawn up and confined by an outer rim. The parchment is allowed to float in a basin of water. Diffusion immediately commences, the crystalloid passing through and dissolving in the water beneath, while the colloid remains behind. Thus, great or small quantities of a very little arsenic dissolved in it gives up the whole of its arsenic to the water, while scarcely a trace of the organic substance passes through. As almost all the poisons in common use—arsenic, corrosive sublimate, oxalic acid, lead acetate, morphia, and salts of strychnine, etc.—are crystalloids, the toxicologist is by this process furnished with an easy mode of detecting their presence, if they are in a form readily soluble in water.

6. [cap.] [< NL.] A genus of dipterous insects. Walker, 1860.

dialytic (dī'al-i-tik), a. [< Gr. διάλυτικός, able to dissolve, < διάλυσις, dissolved, verbal adj. of διάλυσις, dissolve; see dialysis]. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of dialysis, in any sense of that word.—2. In med., unloosening; untracing, as the fibers; relaxing.—3. In math., pertaining to the process of differentiating equations successively until the different powers of the unknown quantities can be regarded as independent.—Dialytic elimination, in math., a method invented by Sylvester, leading to the same result as Euler's method. It consists in increasing the number of equations by successively multiplying them by combinations of powers of the unknowns, until a system of equations is obtained from which the unknown factors of the different terms can be eliminated as independent quantities, the equations being regarded as linear.—Dialytic telescope, a telescope in which the first glass lens is brought down to about half the distance of the crown-glass lens from the eye. It was invented by Littrow in 1837, and constructed by Fraunhofer.

dialyton (dī'al-i-ton), n. [< LGr. διάλυτον, dialysis, orig. neut. of Gr. διάλυσις, dissolved, separated; see dialytic]. In rhet., same as dialysis, 2 (b).

dialyzable (dī'al-i-zā-bl), a. [< dialysis + -able]. Capable of separation by dialysis. Also spelled dialysable.

dialyse (dī'al-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dialysed, ppr. dialysing. [< dialysis, like analysis (analysis, after verbs in -ize, -ise)]. In chem., to separate by dialysis. Also spelled dialyses.—Dialysed iron, a feeble chalybeate for medical use consisting of a solution of ferric oxychloride in water. It is prepared by adding ammonia to a solution of ferric chloride and dissolving the resulting precipitate by agitation. This solution is then dialysed till all crystalloid salts are removed.

Dialysed iron has been injected hypodermically, but in some instances with the following of abscess at the site of puncture.

Buck's Handbook of Med. Science, IV. 226.

dialyser (dī'al-i-ser), n. [< dialysis + -er]. The parchment-paper, or septum, stretched over a wooden or gutta-percha ring, used in the operation of dialysis. Also spelled dialysor.

diamagnet (dī'a-mag-net), n. [< As diamagnetism, after magnet]. A diamagnetic substance.

diamagnetic (dī'a-mag-net-ik), a. and n. [< F. diamagnétique, < Gr. διά, through, across, + μαγνῆς (magnēs), magnet; see magnet, magnetic]. 1. a. Pertaining to or exhibiting diamagnetism.

II. n. A substance which is diamagnetic in a magnetic field of force. See diamagnetism, I.

Paramagnetics tend to move from weak to strong places of force, while diamagnetics tend to go from strong to weak places. J. K. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., II, 17.

diamagnetically (di'-mag-net-i-kal-i), adv.
In a diamagnetic manner; as a diamagnetic.

When submitted to magnetic influence, such crystals (having one axis of figure) take up a position so that their optic axis points diamagnetically or transversely to the lines of magnetic force.

W. R. Grove, Corr. of Forces, p. 171.

diamagnetism (di'-mag-net-izm), n. [= F. diamagnétisme; as diamagnet-ism + -ism.] 1. The phenomena exhibited by a class of substances which, when under the influence of magnetism and freely suspended, take a position with the longer axis at right angles to the magnetic lines of force. From the experiments of Faraday it appears to be clearly established that all matter is subject to the magnetic force as universally as it is to the gravitating force, arranging itself into two divisions, the paramagnetic and the diamagnetic. Among the former are iron, nickel, cobalt, palladium, titanium, and a few other substances; and among the latter are bismuth, antimony, cadmium, copper, gold, lead, mercury, silver, tin, zinc, and most solid, liquid, and gaseous substances. When a paramagnetic substance is suspended freely between the poles of a powerful horseshoe magnet, it points in a line from one pole to the other, which Faraday terms the axial line. On the other hand, when a diamagnetic substance is suspended in the same manner, it is repelled alike by both poles, and assumes an equatorial direction, or a direction at right angles to the axial line.

The magnetism of two iron particles lying in the line of magnetization is increased by their mutual action, but, on the contrary, the diamagnetism of two bismuth particles lying in this direction is diminished by their mutual action. J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., II, 21.

If, however, the magnetism of the molecules were so much increased that they held each other tight, and so could not be turned round by ordinary magnetizing forces, it is shown that effects would be produced like those of diamagnetism. W. E. Clifford, Lectures, I, 241.

2. That branch of magnetism which treats of diamagnetic phenomena and diamagnetic bodies.

diamagnetization (di'-mag-net-i-zé-shon), n.
[diamagnetize (< diamagnet + -ize) + -ation.]
The state of diamagnetic polarity.

diamagnetometer (di'-mag-net-om-é-tér), n.
[diamagnetic + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument used to measure the intensity of the diamagnetic power of different substances.

diamant, n. A Middle English form of diamond.

diamantiferous (di'-g-man-tif-é-rus), a. [F. diamantifère, < diamant, diamond (see diamond), + -fère (E. -ferous), bearing, < L. ferre = E. bear.] Yielding or bearing diamonds; producing diamonds.

Note on the minerals associated with the diamond in the newly-discovered diamantiferous district of Salobra. Nature, XXX, 128.

diamantine (di'-g-man-tin), a. [F. diamantine = Sp. Pg. It. diamantino, adamantine; see adamantine and diamond.] Adamantine.

For in the Heav'n, above all reach of ours,
He dwells immur'd in diamantine Towers.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Ark.

diamoromous (di'-g-me-sog'-a-mus), a. [Gr. διά, through, + μόρος, middle, + γᾶμος, marriage.] In bot., fertilized by the intervention of some external agent, as wind, water, or insects: applied to flowers.

diameter (di-am-é-tér), n. [ME. diametre = D. G. Dan. Sw. diameter, < OF. diametre, F. diamètre = Sp. dímetro = Pg. It. diametro, < L. diametros, < Gr. διαμέτρος, the diagonal of a parallelogram, diameter of a circle (cf. διαμέτρειν, measure through), < διά, through, + μέτρον, a measure; see meter.] 1. In geom., a chord of a circle or a sphere which passes through its center; in general—(a) a chord of a conic cutting it at points tangents to which are parallel; (b) a line intersecting a quadric surface at points where the tangent planes are parallel. The conception was extended by Newton to other algebraic curves by means of the following theorem:

If on each of a system of parallel chords of a curve of the *n*th order there be taken the center of mean distances of the n points where the chord meets the curve, the locus of this center is a straight line, which may be called a diameter of the curve.

2. The length of a diameter; the thickness of a cylindrical or spherical body as measured, in the former case on a diameter of a cross-section made perpendicular to the axis, and in the latter on a line passing through the center: as, a tree two feet in diameter; a ball three inches in diameter. In arch., the diameter of the lower face of the shaft of a column, divided into 60 parts, forms a scale by which all the parts of a classical order are commonly measured. The 60th part of the diameter is called a minute, and 90 minutes make a module.

The space between the earth and the moon, according to Ptolemy, is seventeen times the diameter of the earth.

Apparent diameter of a heavenly body. See apparent.—Biparietal diameter. See biparietal.—Conjugate diameters of a conic. See conjugate.—Ideal diameter, an ideal chord through the center. See ideal.—In diameter, diametrically.

He falls off again warping and warping till he come to contradict himselfe in diameter.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

Tactical diameter. In naval tactics, the space occupied by a ship in turning 180° from a straight course: the diameter of the circle in which the ship turns after her motion has become uniform is called her tactical diameter. Tactical diameters vary according to the angle at which the rudder is held.

diametral (di-am-é-tral), a. and n. [F. diamétral = Sp. Pg. diametral = It. diametrato = D. diametral = Dan. Sw. diametral, < NL. diametralis, < L. diametros, diameter; see diameter and -al.] 1. a. Pertaining to a diameter; diametrical: used especially in the physical sense.

So diametral
One to another, and so much opposed,
As if I can but hold them all together; . . .
I shall have just occasion to believe
My wit is magisterial.

H. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, I, 1.

This band shall occupy a diametral position along the whole height of the vessel, and thus receive the friction the same as the walls of the tube do.

Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXV, 41.

Diametral circle, a circle doubly tangential to a Cartesian oval on its axis of symmetry.—Diametral number. (a) A number equal to  $\frac{1}{2}(1 + \sqrt{2}) + \frac{1}{2}(1 - \sqrt{2})$ , where a is any integer. These numbers are 1, 3, 7, 17, 41, 99, etc. (b) A number resolvable into two factors the sum of whose squares is a square. Thus, 130 is such a number, because  $130 = 8 \times 16 + 16^2 = 17^2$ .—Diametral planes. In crystal., those planes which are parallel to the vertical and one of the lateral axes; a prism formed by such planes is called a diametral prism.

II. n. A diameter; a diagonal.
diametrically (di-am-é-tral-i), adv. In a diametral manner.

diametric (di-g-met-rik), a. Same as diametrical. [Rare.]

diametrical (di-g-met-ri-kal), a. [Gr. διαμετρικός, < διαμέτρος, diameter; see diameter.] 1. Of or pertaining to a diameter; along a diameter; diametral. Prynne.

Every portion of a current proceeding in a diametrical direction from the equator to the centre must progressively rise in temperature.

H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 232.

2. Pertaining to the extremities, as if of a diametrical line; extreme in degree; absolute; utmost: as, their characters are diametrical opposites.—Diametrical opposition, an expression applied by Aristotle to the extreme of opposition; the relation between two propositions which differ as much from each other as two propositions in the same terms can.

At all events he had exposed himself to reproach by diametrical opposition to the profession of his whole life.

Macaulay.

diametrically (di-g-met-ri-kal-i), adv. In a diametrical direction; directly; in an extreme degree.

These sayings seemed to clash with one another, and to be diametrically opposite. Howell, Letters, II, 17.

The real leaders of the party . . . were men bred in principles diametrically opposed to Toryism.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., II.

diamine (di'am-in), n. [Gr. διά, two-, + αμίνια (monia) + -ine.] The name of a class of chemical compounds formed by substituting one or more alcohol radicals for hydrogen in a double molecule made up of two ammonia molecules. Diamines are primary, secondary, or tertiary, according as one, two, or three atoms of hydrogen are replaced.

diamond (di'-g-mond), n. and a. [ME. diamonde, dyamand, diamant, diamant = D. diamant = MHG. diamant, diamant (G. diamant, diamant = Dan. Sw. diamant, < OF. (and F.) diamant = Pr. diaman = Sp. Pg. It. diamante (ML. diamantes, diamantum, MGr. διαμάντις, after Rom.), < L. adamas (adamant), (1) adamant, (2) the diamond; see adamant. The change of form (in simulation of words with prefix dia, < Gr. διά) is supposed to have been due to some association with It. diáfano = F. diaphane, < Gr. διαφανής, transparent; see diaphanous.] 1. n. 1. Adamant; steel, or some imaginary substance of extreme hardness or impenetrability.

Then seal, whose substance is ethereal, arming in complete diamond, ascends his fiery chariot.

Milton.

2. A precious stone, distinguished from all others by being combustible and by its extreme hardness, as well as by its superior refractive and dispersive power. It consists of pure or nearly pure carbon, leaving only a very small quantity of ash when burned. Its specific gravity is about 3; its crystalline form is the isometric, and it cleaves readily in planes parallel to the faces of the regular octahedron.

Natural crystals are found in a great variety of forms belonging to the isometric system. The crystalline planes of the diamond have this peculiarity, that they are frequently more or less convex, and that they are free of crystals usually. The range of color of the diamond is extensive, but hues of light yellow, or straw-color, and brown are of most common occurrence. Diamonds of a decided color, such as green, blue, or even red, are found, but they are extremely rare; only one deep-red diamond is known. A diamond is of the first water when it is without flaw or tint of any kind. The value of the gem increases in an increasing ratio with its weight up to a moderate size; beyond that there is no fixed value. A first-water diamond of one carat being considered worth $100, one of two carats would be held at $800, and one of ten at $11,000. The most desirable form in which the diamond may be cut is called the brilliant. (See cuts under brilliant.) Diamonds formerly came chiefly from India, and later from Brazil; the present principal source of supply is southern Africa, where they are found associated with a peculiar rock of unequivocal volcanic origin. In all other diamondiferous regions diamonds have been found only in the surface detrital material (gravel and sand), or else, rarely, in rock of fragmental origin. See bert.

Thel ben so hard, that no man may pollyshe hem: and men called hem Dymandus in that Contree, and Hamees in another Contree.

Mandelville, Travels, p. 157.

Give me the ring of mine you had at dinner;
Or, for my diamond, the chain you promise'd.

Shak., C. of E., IV, 2.

3. A geometrical figure bounded by four equal straight lines forming two acute and two obtuse angles; a rhomb; a losenge; specifically, such a figure printed in red on a playing-card.—4. A playing-card stamped with one or more red losenge-shaped figures.—5. A tool armed with a diamond, used for cutting glass. Diamonds so used are uncut, and they are so mounted as to set upon the glass, not by an angle, but by a curvilinear edge of the crystal.

6. In base-ball, the square space inclosed within the four bases. See base-ball.—7. In her., the tincture black in blazoning by means of precious stones. See blazon, n.—8. The smallest size of printing-type in common use; a size smaller than pearl. Brilliant, very rarely used, is the only regular size below it.

This line is printed in diamond.

Black diamond. (a) Same as bert, 2. (b) Mineral coal, as consisting, like diamonds, of carbon. [Colloq.]—Bristol diamond. Same as Bristol stone (which see, under stone).—Cornish diamonds. Quartz crystals found in the tin mines of Cornwall.—Diamond cut diamond. the case of an encounter between two very sharp persons.—Matura diamond. a name given in Ceylon to sircen from the district of Matura.—Plate diamond. See the extract.

The cleavage of certain of the African diamonds is so eminent that even the heat of the hand causes some of them to fall in pieces. Such diamonds, generally octahedra, may be recognized by a peculiar watery lustre; they are called plate diamonds. Encyc. Brit., XVI, 281.

Point diamond. See the extract.

When the natural crystal is so perfect and clear that it requires only to have its natural facets polished, . . . jewellers call [it] a point diamond.

Birdwood, Indian Arts, II, 20.

Rose diamond. See rose-cut.—Rough diamond. a diamond uncut; hence, a person of genuine worth, but rude and unpolished. Table diamond. See brilliant.

II. a. 1. Resembling a diamond; consisting of diamonds; set with a diamond or diamonds: as, a diamond luster; a diamond necklace; a diamond ring.

For all the haft twinkled with diamond sparks,
Myriads of topaz-lights, and jacinth-work
Of subtlest jewellery. Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

2. Losenge-shaped; rhombic: as, diamond window-panes.—3. Having rhomboid figures or markings: as, the diamond rattlesnake.—Diamond cotton. a fine fabric of cotton and linen.—Diamond couching. See couching, 3.—Diamond-cut glass. See glass.—Diamond drill. See drill.—Diamond edition. an edition of a work printed in diamond, or in some other very small type.—Diamond fret. See fret.—Diamond linen. a name given to various kinds of diaper, such as toweling, the pattern of which is small losenges.—Diamond-needled glass. See glass.—Diamond netting. See netting.—Diamond pencil. a cutting instrument used by glassers and glass-cutters.—Diamond rattler. diamond rattlesnake, Oreolais adamantus.

diamond (di'-g-mond), v. t. [F. diamond, n.] To set or decorate with diamonds.

He plays, dresses, diamonds himself, even to distinct shoe-buckles for a frock. Wells, Letters, II, 241.

diamond-backed (di'-g-mond-bak), n. The diamond-backed turtle (which see, under diamond-backed).

diamond-backed (di'-g-mond-bakt), a. Having the back marked with losenge-shaped figures.—Diamond-backed turtle. Malaclemys palmeri, a tortoise of the family Emyidae. The shell is keeled, with the shields pale yellow, and marked with brownish rings, which are often impressed; the head and limbs are grayish-black, spotted and lined; the temples are naked; and the nose is covered with soft, spongy skin. It inhabits the salt-water marshes of the middle and eastern Atlantic States, and is especially abundant in Chesapeake bay. This is the "terrapin" of the Philadelphia, Phila-more, and Washington maculae, highly esteemed for food. They are mostly caught in the summer, and sent up in jars or "cans," to be reserved for the winter months.

diamond-beetle (di'-g-mond-bē'tl), n. A splendid South American beetle, Eutimius imperialis, of the family Curculionidae.

diamond-bird (di'-g-mond-bērd), n. The Anglo-Australian name of the shrikes of the genus Pardalotus, as P. punctatus: so called from the marking of the plumage.

diamond-breaker (di'-g-mond-brē'kēr), n. A seal-engraver's instrument, consisting of an air-tight chamber of steel provided with a closely fitting pestle, which under the blows of a hammer pulverizes a diamond without waste.

diamond-cutter (di'-g-mond-kut'er), n. One who cuts and polishes diamonds.

diamond-cutting (di'-g-mond-kut'ing), n. One of three processes by which diamonds are prepared for use as ornaments or in the arts, the others being diamond-cleaving and diamond-polishing. Diamond-cutting is performed by rubbing together two diamonds secured with shellac in wooden holders or handles, one of which is held in each hand of the cutter over the edge of a box called a cutters' box, into which the dust is allowed to fall. This rubbing is continued until each diamond assumes the proper outline, whether brilliant, rose, or briolette, the smaller facets being afterward made by polishing. Both stones are cut at the same time, irrespective of size or shape, or of the outline to be produced. Diamond-cutting is sometimes performed by machinery. In this case one of the handles or dops is stationary and the other is moved backward and forward, both diamonds being cut at the same time, but more rapidly and accurately than by hand.

diamond-draft (di'-g-mond-draft), n. In weaving, a method of drawing the warp-threads through the heddles. E. H. Knight.

diamond-dust (di'-g-mond-dust), n. Same as diamond-powder.

diamonded (di'-g-mon-ded), a. [< diamond + -ed.] 1. Furnished or adorned with diamonds, or as with diamonds: as, all diamonded with dew.

When in Paris the chief of the police enters a ball-room, . . . many diamonded pretenders shrink and make themselves as inconspicuous as they can, or give him a supplicating look as they pass. Emerson, Behavior.

2. Having the figure of an oblique-angled parallelogram, rhomb, or lozenge.

Break a stone in the middle, or lop a bough of a tree, and one shall behold the grain thereof (by some secret cause in nature) diamonded or streaked in the fashion of a lozenge. Fuller, Profane State, p. 303.

diamond-gage (di'-g-mond-gā'), n. A staff in which are set small crystals of sizes decreasing from  $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{16}$  of a carat, used by jewelers in estimating the sizes of small diamonds.

diamond-knot (di'-g-mond-not), n. An ornamental knot worked with the strands of a rope. diamond-mortar (di'-g-mond-mōrt'ār), n. In seal-engraving, a hard steel mortar used to grind diamonds into a fine powder for use in engraving or cutting. It is also used by chemists for pulverizing hard substances.

diamond-plaice (di'-g-mond-plās), n. A local English name (Sussex) of the common plaice, Pleuronectes platessa.

diamond-plate (di'-g-mond-plāt), n. In seal-engraving, a plate of steel on which diamond-powder and oil are spread to prepare it for the rubbing down of the surfaces of stones before and after designs are cut on them.

diamond-point (di'-g-mond-point), n. A stylus having a fragment of a diamond at the end, used in ruling glass, in etching, and in ruling-machines. — Diamond-point chisel. See chisel.

diamond-powder (di'-g-mond-pou'dēr), n. A fine dust produced in diamond-cutting by the abrasion of two stones against each other. It is used in cutting and polishing diamonds, rubies, sapphires, and topazes, and in making cameos, intaglios, etc. Also called diamond-dust.

diamond-setter (di'-g-mond-set'er), n. One who sets or mounts diamonds and other gems in gold, platinum, or other metals.

diamond-shaped (di'-g-mond-shāpt), a. Shaped like a lozenge; rhombic.

Diamond-beetle (Eutimius imperialis), natural size.

diamond-snake (di'-g-mond-snāk), n. 1. A large Australian serpent, Morella spilotes, a kind of boa or python: so called from the pattern of its coloration. — 2. A venomous serpent of Tasmania, Hoplocephalus superbus.

diamond-spar (di'-g-mond-spār), n. Another name for corundum.

diamond-truck (di'-g-mond-truk), n. A cart-truck the side frames of which are diamond-shaped and made of iron.

diamond-weevil (di'-g-mond-wē'vl), n. A name of species of the genus Eutimius, as E. imperialis. See diamond-beetle.

diamond-wheel (di'-g-mond-hwēl), n. In gem-cutting: (a) A wheel made of copper and charged with diamond-powder and oil, used in grinding any gem. (b) A similar wheel made of iron, used with diamond-powder and oil in grinding diamonds. It makes from 2,000 to 3,000 revolutions a minute. Also called shive.

diamond-work (di'-g-mond-wērk), n. In masonry, a method of laying stones so that the joints form lozenge-shaped designs.

diamorphosis (di'-g-mōr'fō-sis), n. [< Gr. διαμορφωσις, a forming, shaping, < διαμορφω, form, shape, < διά, through, + μορφή, form, < μορφή, form.] Same as dimorphism. [Rare.]

On the Diamorphosis of Lophyta, Schlegelium, and Prasiola. H. C. Wood, Fresh-Water Alga, p. 240.

diamortosis (di'-g-mō-tō-sis), n. [< Gr. διαμώρτωσις, < διαμώρτω, put lint into a wound, < διά, through, + μώρ, lint.] In surg., the introduction of lint into a wound.

Diana (di-an'ā or di-ā'nā), n. [L., in OL. also Jana (and rarely Deiana), fem. corresponding to Janus, q. v.; from same root as Diovīs = Jovis, Jupiter, Juno, Dis, and other names of deities: see deity.] 1. In Rom. myth., an original Italian goddess dwelling in groves and about fountains, presiding over the moon, and forbidding the approach of man. She was the patron divinity of the plebeians, and her worship was not favored by the patricians. She was later completely identified in characteristics and attributes with the Greek Artemis (which see).

2. [I. c.] The alchemical name of silver. — 3. [NL.] In zool.: (a) [I. c.] A large African monkey, Cercopithecus diana: so called from a fan-died resemblance of its white coronet to the silver bow of Diana. Also called coloway. (b) A genus of fishes, the type of a peculiar family Dianidae; the young state of Larus (which see). Bisso, 1826. (c) A genus of Coleoptera. Laporte and Gory, 1837. (d) A genus of Mollusca. Clessin, 1878. — Diana of the Ephesians, or Ephesian Artemis, an ancient Asiatic divinity whose worship was adopted by the Ionian Greeks. She was a personification of the fruitfulness of nature, and was quite distinct from the Greek goddess, though assimilated to her by the Ephesians from some resemblance of attributes. She was represented wearing a mural crown and with many breasts, and with the lower part of her body cased, like a mummy, in a sheath bearing mystical figures.

dianatist (di'-g-nat'ik), n. [< Gr. διανέμω, flow through, percolate, < διά, through, + νέμω, flow.] Reasoning logically and progressively from one subject to another. E. Phillips, 1706.

Diana of the Ephesians—From statues in the Museo Nazionale, Naples.

dianostre (di-an-sis'trē), n.; pl. dianostres (-trē). [NL., < Gr. δι-, two-, + νωστρον, pl. νωστρον, hook.] In sponges, a flesh-spicule in the form of a rod with a hook at each end divided by an incision.

dianter (di-an'tēr), n. [*< NL. *diantrus: see diantrous.*] In bot., a plant having two stamens.

Dianthra (di-an'dri-ā), n. pl. [*NL., < *dianthra, having two stamens: see dianthrous.*] The second class in the Linnean system of plants, comprehending all genera with perfect flowers having only two stamens, which are free and distinct.

dianthrian (di-an'dri-an), a. [As dianthrous + -ian.] Same as dianthrous.

dianthrous (di-an'drus), a. [*< NL. *dianthrus, having two stamens, < Gr. δι-, two-, + ανθρον (anthron), a man, in mod. bot. a stamen.*] In bot., having two stamens; specifically, pertaining to or having the characters of the Dianthra.

Dianthus (di-an'tis), n. pl. [NL., < Diana, δ (delta), + -dus.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes: a synonym of Leuacidae. Also Dianides. Bisso, 1826. dianite (di'-g-nit), n. [< dianthum (see def.) < Diana + -ite.] A name given by Franz von Kobell to the columbite of Bodenmais, Bavaria, on the supposition that it contained a new metal called by him dianium.

dianodal (di'-g-nō'dal), a. [< Gr. διά, through, + L. nodus, a knot: see node and nodal.] In math., passing through a node. — Dianodal center, a point related to a system of given points, all but two of which may be arbitrarily chosen, in such a way that if a surface of a certain order has nodes at those given points any additional nodes that it may have must be at one or more of the dianodal centers. — Dianodal curve, a curve so related to a determinate number of given points, all but one of which may be arbitrarily chosen, that if a surface of a given order has nodes at all those points any additional node which it may have must lie somewhere, and may lie anywhere, on the dianodal curve. The dianodal curve for a quartic surface is of the 18th order. — Dianodal surface, a surface on which must lie (except in certain cases) any nodes of a surface of a given order which is to have a certain number of nodes at certain arbitrarily chosen points. Thus, if a quartic surface is to have seven nodes at arbitrarily chosen points, any eighth node which it may have, unless it is at a certain point, must lie somewhere, and may lie anywhere, on a certain sextic surface, the dianodal surface of the seven nodes.

dianoetic (di'-g-nō-et'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. διανοητικός, of or for thinking, intellectual, < διανοεῖν, verbal adj. of διανοεῖσθαι, think of, think over, purpose, < διά, through, + νοεῖν, think, < νοός, contr. νοῦς, mind, thought.] 1. a. Thinking; intellectual; of or pertaining to the discursive faculty.

II. n. That part of logic which treats of ratiocination. Sir William Hamilton proposed to extend the meaning of the term so as to include the whole science of the laws of thought.

I would employ . . . dianoetic to denote the operations of the discursive, elaborative, or comparative faculty. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xviii.

dianology (di'-g-nō-lō-jī), n. [*Irreg. for the analogically reg. *dianacology, < Gr. διάνωσις, intelligence, understanding, thought, purpose (cf. διανοεῖσθαι, think of, purpose: see dianoetic), + -λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.*] That department of philosophy which treats of the dianoetic faculties. Sir W. Hamilton.

dianome (di'-g-nōm), n. [< Gr. διανόμη, distribution, < διανέμω, distribute.] In math., a surface, especially a quartic surface, having all its nodes, over and above the number which can be arbitrarily located, situated on the dianodal surface of the latter.

a. China Pink (Dianthus chinensis). b. Clove Pink (Dianthus Caryophyllus).

Dianthus (di-an'thus), n. [NL., said to be < Gr. diōs, divine, + anthos, a flower; but perhaps < Gr. diandros, double-flowering, < di-, two-, + andros, a flower.] A large herbaceous genus of the natural order Caryophyllaceae, natives of the Mediterranean region and temperate Asia, distinguished from other related genera by a calyculate tubular calyx and peltate seeds with a straight embryo. Various species are known by the common English name of pink, and several have long been in cultivation for the fragrance and beauty of their flowers. From the clove-pink (D. Caryophyllus) of southern Europe have originated all the numerous forms of the carnation. (See carnation.) The sweet-william or bunch-pink (D. barbatus), the pheasant's eye (D. plumarius), and the China or Indian pink (D. Chinensis), in many varieties, are common in gardens, as well as hybrids of these and other species. See pink, and cut on preceding page.

diapasei (di'g-pā-sē), n. Same as diapase.

And make a tuneless Diapase of pleasures.

Spenser, Tears of the Muses.

diapasm (di'g-pā-zm), n. [= F. diapasm, < Gr. diapasma, scented powder to sprinkle over the person, < diandros, sprinkle, < di-, through, + andros, sprinkle.] A perfume consisting of the powder of aromatic herbs, sometimes made into little balls and strung together to be worn as a chain.

There's an excellent diapasm, in a chain too, if you like it.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

diapason (di-g-pā-zon), n. [= D. G. F. Sp. It. diapason = Pg. diapasso, < L. diapason, an octave, < Gr. diapason, the concord of the first and last tones, more correctly written separately, di pasōn, an abbrev. of the phrase di pasōn χορδών συμφωνία, a concord through all the tones—that is, a concord of the two tones obtained by passing through all the tones: di, prep., through; pasōn, gen. pl. fem. of πάς, all; χορδών, gen. pl. of χορδή, a string; συμφωνία, symphony: see dia-, pass-, chora, symphony.] In music: (a) In the ancient Greek system, the octave.

The diapason or eight in music is the sweetest concord; inasmuch as it is in effect an unison.

Beacon, Nat. Hist., § 103.

(b) The entire compass of a voice or an instrument.

But cheerful Birds, chirping him sweet Good-morrows,
With Nature's music do beguile his sorrows;
Teaching the fragrant Porrea, day by day,
The Diapason of their Heaven's lay.

Spenser, Tr. of Du Barlas's Weeks, l. 3.

From harmony to harmony

Through all the compass of the notes it ran,

The diapason closing full in Man.

Dryden, Song for St. Cecilia's Day, 1687, l. 15.

(c) Correct tune or pitch.

Love their motion stay'd

In perfect diapason, whilst they stood

In first obedience, and their state of good.

Milton, A Solemn Music, l. 23.

(d) (1) A rule by which organ-pipes, flutes, etc., are constructed, so as to produce sounds of the proper pitch. (2) A fixed standard of pitch, as the French diapason normal, according to which the A next above middle C has 435 vibrations per second. See pitch. (3) A tuning-fork. (e) In organ-building, the two principal foundation-stops, called respectively the open diapason and the stopped diapason. The open diapason has metal pipes of large scale, open at the top, giving that full, sonorous, majestic tone which is the typical organ-tone. The stopped diapason has wooden pipes of large scale, stopped at the top by wooden plugs, giving that powerful, flute-like tone which is the typical flute-tone of the organ. The most important mutation-stops of the open-diapason species are the double open diapason, sounding the octave below the key struck; the principal or octave, sounding the octave above; and the fifteenth, sounding the second octave above. Those of the stopped-diapason species are the bourdon, sounding the octave below; the flute, sounding the octave above; and the pizzolo, sounding the second octave above. Many varieties of each of these occur. See stop.—Diapason diapente, or diapason cum diapente, in Gr. and medieval music, the interval of an octave and a fifth, or a twelfth.—Diapason dissonance, or diapason cum dissonance, in Gr. and medieval music, the interval of an octave and a fourth, or an eleventh.—Diapason ditone, in Gr. and medieval music, the interval of an octave and a major third, or a major tenth.—Diapason normal, the pitch which is recognized as the standard in France. See pitch.—Diapason semi-ditone, in Gr. and medieval music, the interval of an octave and a minor third, or a minor tenth.—Out of diapason, out of tune.

diaped (di'g-ped), n. In math., a line common to the planes of two non-contiguous faces of a polyhedron, just as the diagonal of a polygon is the line joining two non-contiguous vertices.

diapedesis (di'g-pē-dē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. diapēsis, a leaping through, an oozing through the tissues, < diandros, leap through, ooze through, < di-, through, + andros, leap, spring.] The oozing of the blood-corpuscles through the walls of the blood-vessels without visible rupture.

diapedetic (di'g-pē-det'ik), a. [ < diapedesis (-des-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of diapedesis.

Diapensiaceae (di-g-pen-si-ā-sē-sē), n. pl. [NL., < Diapensia (Linnaeus), the typical genus (< Gr. di-, four, by five, in ref. to the flower: see diapente), + -aceae.]

A small order of gamopetalous dicotyledons, somewhat allied to the Ericaceae, including 6 genera and 8 or 9 species, widely separated in their distribution. Diapensia, of 2 species, alpine or arctic in eastern North America, northern Europe and Asia, Tibet, and Pyrola, of the pine-barrens of New Jersey, are dwarf heath-like evergreens. The other genera, Shortia, Galax, etc., of the Alleghany mountains, Japan, and Tibet, are acaulescent scapigerous plants with creeping rootstocks and evergreen leaves.

diapente (di-g-pen'tē), n. [ < L. diapente, < Gr. diapente, for di pasōn, so. χορδών συμφωνία, the interval of a fifth (cf. diapason): di-, prep., through; pasōn, E. pasē.] 1. In Gr. and medieval music, the interval of a fifth.—2. In pharmacology, a composition of five ingredients; an old electrolyte consisting of the diatessaron with the addition of another medicine.—Diapason diapente. See diapason.

diaper (di'g-pēr), n. [ < ME. dyaper, diapery, < OF. diapre, diapre = Pr. diapre (cf. ML. diaprus, diapra), a kind of ornamented cloth, diapered cloth; a particular use of OF. diapre, diapre = Pr. diapre = Sp. diapero, diapero = Pg. diapero = It. diapero, jasper, < L. iaspis (d-), jasper: see jasper, which is thus a doublet of diaper.] 1. Originally, a silken fabric of one color having a pattern of the same color woven in it; now, a textile fabric having a pattern not strongly defined, and repeated at short intervals; especially, such a fabric of linen, where the pattern is indicated only by the direction of the thread, the whole being white or in the unbleached natural color. Compare damask, 1 (d). The pattern of such diaper is usually a series of squares, lozenges, and the like, or of sets of squares, etc., one within another.

Anie weaver, which his works doth boast

In diaper, in damask, or in lyne.

Spenser, Malcolmois, l. 364.

Six chests of diaper, four of damask.

B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 1.

2. A pattern for decoration of any kind consisting of a simple figure often repeated, as in the woven fabric. Hence—3. Any pattern constantly repeated over a relatively large surface, whether consisting of figures separated by the background only, or of compartments constantly succeeding one another, and filled with a design, especially a geometric design, or one based on a flower-form. It is used in architecture, especially medieval, sculptured in low relief as an ornamental ground, and is frequent in manuscript illumination, in painted panels, especially with gilding, and as a decoration for other flat surfaces.

4. In her., same as diapering.—5. A towel or napkin.

Let one attend him with a silver basin, . . .

Another bear the ewer, the third a diaper.

Shak., T. of the 8, Ind., l.

6. A square piece of cloth for swaddling the nates and adjacent parts of an infant; a cloth.—Bird's-eye diaper, a kind of toweling.

diaper (di'g-pēr), v. [ME. only in pp. diaped, diaped, after OF. diapré, pp. of diaprer, F. diaprer, diaper, ornament with diaper-work; from the noun.] 1. To variegate or diversify, as cloth, with figures; flower: as, diapered silk.

Let the ground whereas her foot shall tread,
For fear the stones her tender foot should wrong,
Be strewed with fragrant flowers all along,
And diapered like the discolored mead.

Spenser, Epithalamion, l. 51.

Down-droop'd in many a flowing fold,

Engarlanded and diaper'd

With inwrought flowers, a cloth of gold.

Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

2. To draw or work in diaper, or as part of a diaper; introduce in a diapered pattern or fabric.

A scope covered with tress and diapered birds.

Tennyson, in E. K. Fennell, p. 38.

II. intrans. To draw a series or succession of flowers or figures, as upon cloth.

If you diaper upon folds, let your work be broken, and taken, as it were, by the half: for reason tells you that your fold must cover somewhat unseen.

Pooleman, Drawing.

diapering (di'g-pēr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of diaper, v.] 1. (a) A diaper pattern.—2. In her., the decoration of the surface with ornament other than heraldic bearings: said of the field or of any ordinary. Also called diaper.

Diaperis (di-g-pē-ris), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. diapēris, drive through, perforate, < di-, through, + peirō, pierce, perforate.] A genus of stracheliate heteromorous beetles, of the family Tenebrionidae and subfamily Tenebrioninae. It is characterized by the broadly

a, larva; b, beetle; c, under side of head of larva; d, foot of same; e, antennae of beetle. (Lines show natural size.)

Diaperis is a shining-black beetle, with bright orange-red elytra with variable black markings.

diapery, n. See diaper.

diaphanet (di-af'g-nē), a. [As diaphanous + -et.] Same as diaphanous.

Divers diaphanet glasses filled with several waters, that showed like so many stones of orient and transparent hues.

B. Jonson, Entertainment at Theobalds.

diaphane (di'g-fān), n. [= F. diaphane, transparent, < Gr. diaphanēs, transparent: see diaphanous.] 1. A silk fabric having figures more translucent than the rest of the stuff.—2. In anat., a cell-wall; the investing membrane of a cell or sac. [Rare.]

diaphanetia (di'g-fā-nē-ti), n. [ < F. diaphanetia, irreg. < Gr. diaphanēia, transparency, < diaphanēs, transparent: see diaphanous.] The power of transmitting light; transparency; diaphanousness; pellucidness.

It [the garnet] varies in diaphanetia from transparent to nearly opaque.

Encyc. Brit., X. 51.

diaphanet (di-g-fān'ik), a. [ < Gr. diaphanēs, transparent, + -ic.] Same as diaphanous. Raleigh.

diaphanometer (di'g-fā-nom'e-tēr), n. [ < Gr. diaphanēs, transparent, + μέτρον, a measure.] 1. An instrument for estimating the transparency of the air.—2. An instrument for testing spirits by comparing their transparency with that of spirits of known purity.

diaphanoscope (di-g-fān'ō-skōp), n. [ < Gr. diaphanēs, transparent, + σκοπεῖν, view: see diaphanous.] A dark box in which transparent positive photographs are viewed, either with or without a lens. The positive should be placed as far from the eye as the equivalent focal length of the lens with which the negative was taken; and when a lens is used for viewing the picture, its focal length should be the same as that of the lens with which it was taken.

diaphanotype (di-g-fān'ō-tīp), n. [ < Gr. diaphanēs, transparent, + τύπος, impression.] In photog., a picture produced by coloring on the back a positive lightly printed on a translucent paper, and placing this colored print exactly over a strong duplicate print.

diaphanous (di-af'g-nus), a. [(Cf. F. diaphane = Pr. diaphan = Sp. diáfano = Pg. diáfano = It. diáfano) < Gr. diaphanēs, transparent, < diaphanō, show through, < di-, through, + phainō, show: see fancy = fantasy = phantasy, fantom = phantom.] Transmitting light; permitting the passage of light; transparent; clear; translucent.

Behold the daybreak!

The little light fades the immense and diaphanous shadows!

Walt Whitman.

diaphanously (di-af'g-nus-lī), adv. Transparently.

diaphanousness (di-af'g-nus-nēs), n. The quality of being diaphanous.

diaphanetric (di-af'g-nē-trik), a. [ < Gr. di-, through, + μέτρον, touch, + μέτρον, measure, + -ic.] Relating to the measurements of the tactile sensibility of parts: as, diaphragmatic compasses. Dunglison.

diaphragma (di-á-fon'ík, -t-kál), a. [Gr. diáphragma, dissonant, discordant, taken in lit. sense of 'sounding through or across,' < diá, through, across, + phragmá, a sound.] Same as diacoustic.

diaphonics (di-á-fon'íks), n. [Pl. of diaphonic: see -ics.] Same as diacoustics.

diaphony (di-á-f'ón), n. [Gr. diáphonia, dissonance, discord, < diáphōnōs, dissonant, discordant: see diaphonic. Cf. symphony.] 1. In anc. Gr. music, a dissonance: distinguished from symphony.—2. In medieval music, the earliest and crudest form of polyphony, in which two, three, or four voices proceeded in strictly parallel motion, at such intervals with one another as the octave, the fifth, and the fourth. Also called organum.

diaphoresis (di-á-f'ō-r'is), n. [LL. perspiration, < Gr. diáphōrōs, a carrying off, perspiration, < diáphōrōs, spread abroad, carry off, throw off by perspiration, < diá, through, + phōrōs, carry, freq. of phōrō = E. bear.] In med., perspiration, especially when artificially produced.

The insensible halitus, when in a quantity to be condensed, and in this state sensible to the feelings, is the diaphoresis. Perr. Med. Diet. (Ord. M.).

diaphoretic (di-á-f'ō-r'et'ík), a. and n. [Gr. diáphōrētikos, promoting perspiration, < diáphōrōs, throw off by perspiration: see diaphoresis.] 1. a. Promoting or increasing perspiration; sudorific.

A diaphoretic medicine, or a sudorific, is something that will provoke sweating. Wette.

Diaphoretic antimony. See antimony.

II. n. A medicine which promotes perspiration; a sudorific.

Diaphoretics, or promoters of perspiration, help the organs of digestion, because the attenuation of the aliment makes it perspirable. Arbuthnot.

diaphoretical (di-á-f'ō-r'et'í-kál), a. Same as diaphoretic.

diaphorite (di-á-f'ō-r'it), n. [Gr. diáphōros, different (< diáphōrōs, differ: see differ), + -ite.] A mineral having the same composition as freieslebenite, but crystallizing in the orthorhombic system.

diaphragm (di-á-frám), n. [F. diaphragme = Sp. diaphragma = Pg. diaphragma = It. diaphragma, < LL. diaphragma, < Gr. diáphragma, a partition-wall, barrier, the midriff, diaphragm, < diáphragma, separate by a barrier, barricade, < diá, between, + phragmá, equiv. to the more common phōrōs, fence, inclose, = L. farcio, stuff, whence ult. E. farce and force, q. v.] 1. A partition; something which divides or separates. Specifically—2. In mech.: (a) A thin piece, generally of metal, serving as a partition, or for some other special purpose: as, the vibrating diaphragm of a telephone, for the communication of transmitted sounds. (b) A ring, or a plate pierced with a circular hole so arranged as to fall in the axis of the instrument, used in optical instruments to cut off marginal beams of light, as in a camera or a telescope. Such diaphragms are often made movable, especially for photographic lenses, so that one with a large opening may be inserted when it is desired to admit abundant light to the lens, in order to use a short exposure, and one with a small opening when sharpness of detail is more desirable than shortness of exposure. 3. In anat., the midriff; the musculomembranous partition which separates the thoracic from the abdominal cavity in mammals. In man the diaphragm consists of a muscular sheet whose fibers radiate from a central tendinous center to attach themselves to the lower margin of the thorax, and behind form a large bundle on either side, called pillars of the diaphragm. The diaphragm is pierced by three principal openings: the esophageal, for the passage of the esophagus accompanied by the pneumogastric nerves; the aortic, for the passage of the aorta, thoracic duct, and large azygos vein; and the caval, for the inferior vena cava; besides some others for splanchnic nerves, etc. The diaphragm is invested on its thoracic surface by the pleural and pericardial serous membranes; on its abdominal surface by the peritoneum, a fold of which, reflected upon the liver, forms the suspensory ligament of that organ. The diaphragm is deeply concavo-convex, the convexity upward; the general figure is that of an umbrella. It is a powerful respiratory muscle, contracting at each inspiration and so flattening, while its relaxation in expiration renders it more convex; its contraction also assists in dehiscence and in partition and anealing; when most relaxed it rises to the level of about the fifth rib. A rudimentary diaphragm exists in birds; it is best developed in the aperyx.

4. In cryptogamic bot., in Equisetum, a transverse partition in the stem at the node; in Selaginella and its allies, a layer separating the prothallium from the cavity of the macrospore; in Characeae, a constriction formed by the enveloping cells near the tip of the oogonium.—5. In conch., a septum or shelf-like plate extending into the cavity of a shell, more or less partitioning it.—Also of the diaphragm. See ala.

—Crura of the diaphragm. See crura.—Mus diaphragm, a form of diaphragm used with lenses, in which the axis of the aperture is varied at will, and at the same time kept nearly circular by the simultaneous motion of a large number of small shutters.—Ligaments of the diaphragm, the internal and external arcuate ligaments border of the mammalian diaphragm, where it arches over the psoas and quadratus lumborum muscles.—Pillars of the diaphragm. See def. 3.—Revolving diaphragm, in optics, a lens-diaphragm consisting of a disk pierced with holes of various diameters, and pivoted in such a position that by rotating it any opening desired may be brought in line with the axis of the lens.—Trestle of the diaphragm, the three leads into which the musculomembranous part of the diaphragm is disposed.

diaphragma (di-á-frág-má), a. [Gr. diáphragma (LL. diaphragma) + -a.] 1. Partitioning or separating, as a partition between two cavities; septal.—2. Same as diaphragmatic.

diaphragmalgia, diaphragmalgy (di-á-frág-mál'jī, -jī), n. [NL. diaphragmalgia, < Gr. diáphragma, diaphragm, + álgos, pain.] Pain in the diaphragm.

diaphragmatic (di-á-frág-mát'ík), a. [LL. diaphragma (-), diaphragm, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the diaphragm. Also diaphragmatic.—Diaphragmatic foramina. See foramen.—Diaphragmatic ganglion. See ganglion.—Diaphragmatic suture. Same as angina pectoris (which see, under angina).

diaphragmatitis (di-á-frág-má-tis), n. [NL. < LL. diaphragma (-), diaphragm, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the diaphragm or of its serous coats. Also diaphragmitis.

diaphragmatocoele (di-á-frág-mát'ō-sē), n. [Gr. diáphragma (-), diaphragm, + cēle, tumor.] In pathol., hernia, or a tumor, from a part of the viscera escaping through the diaphragm.

diaphragmodynia (di-á-frág-mō-din'ī), n. [NL. < Gr. diáphragma, diaphragm, + dynē, pain.] Pain in the diaphragm.

diaphyses, n. Plural of diaphysis.

diaphysal (di-á-fis'ál), a. [Gr. diáphysis + -al.] Pertaining to a diaphysis; extending continuously between two ends, as the shaft of a bone.

diaphysis (di-á-fis'is), n.; pl. diaphyses (-ēs). [NL. < Gr. diáphysis, a growing through, bursting of the bud, < diáphysōs, grow through, of buds, < diá, through, + physōs, grow: see physic, etc.] 1. In bot., an abnormal elongation of the axis of a flower or of an inflorescence; a form of proliferation.—2. In anat., the continuity of a bone between its two ends; the shaft of a long bone, as distinguished from its epiphyses or apophyses.

diaplasia (di-á-plā-sis), n. [NL. < Gr. diáplasis, a putting into shape, setting of a limb (Galen), < diáplasis, form, mold, set a limb, < diá, through, + plasis, form, mold.] In verg., reduction, as of a dislocation or fracture. Dunglison.

diaplastic (di-á-plas'tík), a. and n. [Gr. diáplastikos, verbal adj. of diáplasis, form (see diaplasia), + -ic.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to diaplasia: as, a diaplastic medicine or embrocation.

II. n. A medicine used in the treatment of fractured or dislocated limbs.

diaplex (di-á-plēks), n. Same as diaplexus.

diaplexal (di-á-plēks'ál), a. [Gr. diáplex + -al.] Pertaining to the diaplexus.

diaplexus (di-á-plēks'us), n. [NL. < Gr. diáplex, through, + L. plexus: see plexus.] The choroid plexus of the diencephalon or third ventricle of the brain. Also diaplex.

diapnoet (di-á-p'no-t), n. [Gr. diápnōē, a passage, outlet, evaporation, perspiration, < diápnōs, blow through, < diá, through, + pnōs, blow.] Sweating; perspiration. E. Phillips, 1708.

diapnoe (di-á-p'no-ik), a. and n. [= F. diapnoe: see diapnoe + -ic.] 1. a. In med., producing a very slight, insensible perspiration; gently diaphoretic.

II. n. A remedial agent which produces a very slight, insensible perspiration; a mild diaphoretic.

diapnoetic (di-á-p'no-t'ík), a. [Gr. diápnōē, passage, outlet, perspiration (see diapnoe), + -ot-.] Promoting gentle perspiration.

diapophyses, n. Plural of diapophysis.

diapophysal (di-á-p'p'is'ál), a. [Gr. diáphysis + -al.] Pertaining to a diapophysis; having the morphological character of a diapophysis: as, a diapophysal process; the diapophysal element of a vertebra. Geol. Jour.

diapophysis (di-á-p'p'is'is), n.; pl. diapophyses (-ēs). [NL. < Gr. diáphysis, through, + phōs, outgrowth: see apophysis.] The transverse process proper of a vertebra; the lateral process from each side of the neural arch, paired with its fellow of the opposite side of the same vertebra. It is one of the most constant and characteristic of the several vertebral apophyses. When there are more than one pair of transverse processes, the diapophysis is the dorsal or neural one, as distinguished from a parapophysis or pleuropophysis. In cervical vertebrae the diapophyses are commonly confluent with pleuropophyses, forming a compound transverse process, pierced by the vertebral foramen, the posterior tubercular being the proper diapophysal portion of such formations. See cut under axis, cervical, and dorsal.

diaporesis (di-á-p'p'is'is), n. [LL. < Gr. diáporōs, a doubting, a rhetorical figure so called, < diáporōs, doubt, be at a loss, < diá, through, apart, + porōs, be at a loss: see aporia.] In rhet., a figure by which the speaker professes to be in doubt which of several statements to make, which of several courses to pursue or recommend, where to begin or end, or, in general, what to say on a topic: as, What shall I do—remain silent or speak freely? Shall I call this folly, or shall I call it crime? If a judge, the audience, or an opponent is asked to settle the doubt, the figure is called anacoenosis.

Diapriinae (di-á-p'ri-á-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Diapria + -inae.] A subfamily of parasitic hymenopterous insects, of the family Proctotrypidae. They have entire hind wings, 1-spurred fore tibiae, antennae inserted above the mouth, and the broad hind wings with no middle vein. The subfamily was established by Haliday in 1840.

diapry, a. [F. diapré, diapeded, pp. of diaprer, diaper, adorn with diaper-work: see diaper, v.] Adorned with diaper-work; variegated.

The Diapry Mansions, where man-kinds doth trade, Were built in Six Days: and the Seventh was made The sacred Sabbath.

Splinter, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Handy-Crafts.

diaprysis (di-á-p'ri-sis), n. [NL. < Gr. diáprōsis, suppuration, < diáprōs, suppurate: see diaprytic.] Suppuration. Dunglison.

diaprytic (di-á-p'ri-t'ík), a. and n. [Gr. diáprōtikos, promoting suppuration, < diáprōs, suppurate, < diá, through, + prōs, pus.] 1. a. In med., producing suppuration; suppurative.

II. n. A medicine which produces suppuration; a suppurative.

diapyle (di-á-pil), n. [Gr. diá, through, + pylē, gate, entrance.] A term applied by Miers to a perforation through the testa at the end of a seed, for the passage of the raphe.

diarchy (di-á-ki), n.; pl. diarchies (-is). [Gr. as if diárxōs, < diárxōs, only in pl. diárxōs, lit. two rulers, < di, two-, + rxōs, rule.] A government in which the executive power is vested in two persons, as that of the two joint kings of Sparta or of Ham, or as in the case of William and Mary of England. Also, erroneously, diarchoy.

diarrhodon (di-á-r'ō-don), n. [ML. < diarrhodon, < diarrhodon, also diarrhodon, < Gr. diárrhōdōs, compounded of rosē, < diá, between, + rhōdōs, a rose.] A color mentioned in medieval descriptions of stuffs: probably, from its derivation, a brilliant red.

diarial (di-á-ri-ál), a. [LL. diarium, a diary, + -al.] Same as diarian.

diarian (di-á-ri-án), a. [LL. diarium, a diary, + -an.] Pertaining to a diary or journal; journalistic.

Lower Surface of Human Diaphragm.
A, esophagus; P.C.I., inferior vena cava; T.B.A., thoracic duct; B, aorta.

You take a name; Philander's odes are seen,
Printed, and praised, in every magazine;
Diarian sages greet their brother sage,
And your dark pages please th' enlighten'd age.
Craib, News-paper.

diarist (di'ar-ist), n. [< diary + -ist.] One who keeps a diary.

Incidents written down by a monk in his cell, or by a diarist pacing the round with majesty, would be equally warped by the views of the monastery in the one case, or by a flattering subservience to the higher power in the other.
J. D. Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I, 274.

William [of Malmsbury] stands next in order of time after Bede in the series of our historical writers, properly so called, as distinguished from mere compilers and diarists.
Cruik, Hist. Eng. Lit.

diarise (di'ar-iz), v. t. or i.; pret. and pp. diarised, ppr. diarising. [< diary + -ize.] To record in a diary; write a diary.

The history that the earliest men of New England wrote was what we may call contemporaneous history; it was historical diarising.
M. C. Tyler, Hist. Amer. Lit., I, 116.

diarrhea, diarrhoea (di'ar-rē'ā), n. [= F. diarrhée = Sp. diarrea = Pg. diarrhoea = It. diarrea = D. diarrhoea = G. diarrhoe = Dan. Sw. diarrhe, < L.L. diarrhœa, < Gr. diarrhœa, diarrhoea, lit. a flowing through, < diapnein, flow through, < dia, through, + peiv, flow.] A morbidly frequent evacuation of the bowels, generally arising from inflammation or irritation of the mucous membrane of the intestines, and commonly caused by errors in regimen, as the use of food hurtful from its quantity or quality; intestinal catarrh.

diarrheal, diarrhoeal (di'ar-rē'al), a. [< diarrhœa, diarrhœa, + -al.] Pertaining to or resulting from diarrhoea; having the character of or characterizing diarrhoea; catarrhal, with reference to the intestines.

That three thousand and more individuals, mostly children, died from diarrhoeal diseases, does not surprise one who is familiar with the intense heat of our summer.
Science, IX, 88.

diarrhetic, diarrhoeic (di'ar-rē'ik), a. [< diarrhœa, diarrhœa, + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of diarrhoea; as, a diarrhetic flux.

diarrhetic, diarrhoeic (di'ar-rē'ik), a. [Irreg. < diarrhœa, diarrhœa, + -ic.] Same as diarrhetic.

diarthrodial (di'ar-thrō'di-al), a. [< diarthrosis, after arthrodial.] Pertaining to or of the nature of diarthrosis; as, a diarthrodial articulation; diarthrodial movement.

diarthromere (di'ar-thrō-mēr), n. [< Gr. diarthromere, < diarthromere, q. v.] A vertebrate metamere; the typical double-ring or figure-8 segment of the body of a vertebrate animal, corresponding to a theoretically complete vertebra and its accompaniments.
Cohen, 1868.

diarthromeric (di'ar-thrō-mēr'ik), a. [< diarthromere + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a diarthromere or metamere of a vertebrate.
Cohen.

diarthrosis (di'ar-thrō'sis), n.; pl. diarthroses (-ēs). [NL., < Gr. diarthrosis, division by joints, articulation, < diarthroiv, divide by joints, < dia, between, + arthroiv, join, articulate, < arthroiv, a joint. Cf. arthrosis.] In anat., that articulation of bones which leaves them free to move in some or any direction; free, as distinguished from fixed, arthrosis; thorough-joint: applied both to the joints themselves and to the motion resulting from such mechanism. The principal kinds of articulation thus designated are enarthrosis, or ball-and-socket joint, the freest of all, as seen in the hip and shoulder; ginglymus, or hinge-joint, as in the elbow and knee; and cylarthrosis, or pivot-joint. See arthrosis. Also called arthrosis.—Rotatory diarthrosis. Same as cylarthrosis.

diary (di'ar-i), a. and n. [*< L. as if *diarius*, adj. (only as noun: see II.), < dies, day: see II.] 1. a. Lasting for one day: as, a diary fever.
Bacon.

II. n.; pl. diaries (-riz). [= Sp. Pg. It. diario, < L. diarium, a daily allowance for soldiers, L.L. also a diary, neut. of **diarius*, adj., < dies, day: see diat, diety.] The synonym journal is of the same ult. origin. 1. An account of daily events or transactions; a journal; specifically, a daily record kept by a person of any or all matters within his experience or observation: as, a diary of the weather; a traveler's diary.

In sea-voyages, where there is nothing to be seen but sky and sea, men . . . make diaries; but in land-travel, wherein so much is to be observed, . . . they omit it.
Bacon, Travel.

2. A book prepared for keeping a diary; especially, a book with blank leaves bearing printed dates for a daily record, often including other printed matter of current use or interest: as, a lawyers' diary.

This is my diary,
Wherein I note my notions of the day.
B. Jonson, Volpone, iv, 1.

diaseuant, n. See diasevant.

diasevima (di'ar-ski'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. διάσημα, anything cloven, in music half the diesis, < diazēiv, cleave, sever, < dia, asunder, + zēiv, cut, separate: see schisma.] 1. In anc. Gr. music, a minute interval whose size is variously given.—2. In modern music, the larger subdivision of a syntonic comma (see comma, 5, b), represented by the ratio 2048:2025. In strict intonation it is the interval between C and D♯. A diasevima and a schisma together equal a syntonic comma.

diasevium (di'ar-ski'rē'di-um), n.; pl. diaseviums (-ia). [< Gr. διάσημα, through, + σέβιον, a certain plant: see sevivum.] An electrolyte in the composition of which the plant scordium or water-germander formed an important element.
Dunlop.

With their syrups, and their juleps, and diasevium, and mithridate, and my lady wist-shall-call-um's powder.
Scott, Abbot, xvi.

diasia (di'ar-si'ā), n. pl. [< Gr. Δίασια, pl., < Ζεύς (gen. Διός), Zeus.] An ancient Attic festival in honor of Zeus Meilichios (the Propitiator), celebrated without the walls, with sacrifices and rejoicing, in the latter half of the month Arctesterion (beginning of March).

diasevnaia (di'ar-ski'rē'ā-siā), n. [NL., as if < Gr. διασεβναία, < διασεβνέω, revise: see diasevnaia.] Revision; editing.

The authorship of this work is aptly attributed to Vyasa, "the arranger," the personification of Indian diasevnaia.
Encyc. Brit., XXI, 281.

diasevnaist (di'ar-ski'rē'ast), n. [< Gr. διασεβναστής, a reviser, an interpolator, < διασεβνέω, get quite ready, set in order, revise for publication, < dia, through, + σεβνέω, make ready, prepare, < σέβιον, implement, tool, equipment.] A reviser; an interpolator: used especially with reference to old recensions of Greek writings. Also written diasevnaist.

I should be inclined to suspect the hand of the diasevnaist in this passage more than in almost any other of the poems.
Gladstone, Studies on Homer, II, 88.

But these fables only purport to be Babrius spoiled, after having passed through the hands of a diasevnaist: that is, some late writer who has turned his verses into barbarous Greek and wretched metre.
Encyc. Brit., III, 181.

Diapsina (di'as-pi'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Diapsis + -ina.] A subfamily of Coccidae, typified by the genus Diapsis; the scale-lice. Also written Diapsina.

Named Diapsina from its principal genus, Diapsis. It contains some of the most pernicious insects in existence, which, by reason of their vast multiplicity, ruin or destroy whole orchards of valuable fruit trees, or groves of shade trees.
Stand. Nat. Hist., II, 214.

Diapsis (di'as-pis), n. [NL., < Gr. διά, through, + σπίς, a shield.] The typical genus of scale-insects of the subfamily Diapsina.

diapsora (di'as-pō'rā), n. [< Gr. διασπορά, a scattering, dispersion, collectively, in the Septuagint and New Testament, the dispersed Jews, < διασπερив, scatter, sow abroad, < dia, through-out, + σπερив, scatter, sow.] The dispersion of the Jews; among the Hellenistic Jews and in the New Testament, the whole body of Jews living scattered among the Gentiles after the Babylonian captivity: also used by the Jewish Christians of the apostolic age for their fellow Christians outside of Palestine (rendered "the strangers" in the authorized version of 1 Pet. i, 1, and "the Dispersion" in the revised version).

The development of Judaism in the diapsora differed in important points from that in Palestine.
Encyc. Brit., XVIII, 760.

diaspore (di'ar-spōr), n. [< Gr. διασπορά, a scattering, see diapsora.] A hydrate of aluminum occurring in crystals and foliated masses, colorless or of a pearly gray. It is infusible, and a small fragment placed in the flame of a candle, or exposed to the flame of the blowpipe, almost instantly decrepitates and is dispersed: hence its name.

diasporet, n. [< ML. diasprus, diasper, jasper: see diapor, jasper.] Same as jasper.

Great stones like to Cornelians, Granaia, Agate, Diasporet, Caledonit, Hematite, and some kinds of natural Diamonds.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 214.

diasprom (di'as-prōn), n. [ML., var. of diasprius, diasper, jasper, etc.: see diapor.] Same as diapor.

diastaltic (di'ar-stal'tik), a. [< Gr. διασταλτικός, able to distinguish, in music able to expand or exalt the mind, < διαστέλλω, dilate, expand, distinguish, < dia, apart, + στέλλω, send.] In Gr. music, dilated or extended: applied both to particular intervals and to a general heroic quality in a melody.

diastase (di'ar-stā), n. [< F. diastase, diastase, lit. separation (see dist.), < Gr. διάστασις, separation: see diastasis.] A substance existing in barley, oats, wheat, and potatoes after germination. It is obtained by digesting in a mixture of three parts of water and one of alcohol, at a temperature of 115°, a certain quantity of germinated barley ground and dried in the open air, and then putting the whole under pressure and distilling it. Diastase is solid, white, and soluble in water and diluted alcohol, but insoluble in strong alcohol. In solution it possesses the property of causing starch to break up at the temperature of 150°, transforming it first into dextrin and then into sugar.

diastasis (di'ar-stā'sis), n.; pl. diastases (-ēs). [NL., < Gr. διάστασις, a separation, < διαστέλλω, pres. διαστέλλω, separate, cause to stand apart, < dia, apart, + στέλλω, pres. στέλλω, cause to stand, = E. sta-nd.] Forcible separation of bones without fracture, as the result of external mechanical injury or direct violence; dislocation; luxation.

diastatic (di'ar-stat'ik), a. [< Gr. διαστατικός, separative (cf. diastasis), separation: see diastase, < διαστέλλω, pres. διαστέλλω, separate: see diastasis.] Of or pertaining to diastase; possessing the properties of diastase: as, a diastatic ferment.

diastatically (di'ar-stat'i-kal-i), adv. In the manner of diastase.

The quantity of the diastatically acting albuminous substances increases with the progress of germination.
Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 591.

diastem (di'ar-stem), n. [< L.L. diastema, interval: see diastema.] Same as diastema, 2.

diastema (di'ar-stē'mā), n.; pl. diastemata (-mā-tā). [L.L., an interval, esp. in music, < Gr. διάστημα, an interval, difference, < διαστέλλω, separate: see diastasis.] 1. In anat. and anat., an interval between two consecutive teeth, especially between any two series or kinds of teeth, as between the canines and premolars or incisors, or among the incisors, as in many bats. When there are no canines, as in rodents, diastema occurs between the incisors and the premolars. It necessarily occurs when opposing teeth are so long that they cross each other when the mouth is shut. Man is notable as having normally no diastema, his teeth forming a continuous series, and being all of approximately equal length. But the same is the case with some other mammals, as in the genera Ternstroemia and Amphiprotium.

2. In anc. Gr. music, an interval. Also diastem.

diaster (di'as-tēr), n. [< Gr. διαστήρ, + αστήρ, star.] In biol., a double star; the caryocinetic figure which results from the aster of a nucleus before this separates into two nuclei. See aster and caryocinesis. Also dyaster.

A polar star is seen at each end of the nucleus-spindle, and is not to be confused with the diaster.
E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XII, 88.

diastimeter (di'ar-stim'ē-tēr), n. [Prop. **diastimeter*, < Gr. διάστασις, distance, interval (< διαστέλλω, διαστέλλω, stand apart), + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring distances.
E. H. Knight.

diastole (di'as-tōl), n. [L.L., < Gr. διαστολή, dilatation, expansion, lengthening of a syllable, < διαστέλλω, dilate, expand, put asunder: see diastaltic.] 1. The normal rhythmical dilatation or relaxation of the heart or other blood-vessel, which alternates with systole or contraction, the two movements together constituting pulsation or beating: as, auricular diastole; ventricular diastole. The term is also extended to some other pulsating organs, as lymph-hearts, and specifically to the expanding action of the contractile vesicle of infusorians and other protozoans.

2. The period or length of time during which a rhythmically pulsating vessel is relaxed or dilated; the time-interval which alternates with systole.—3. In Gr. gram., a mark similar in position and shape to a comma, but originally semicircular in form, used to indicate the correct separation of words, and guard against a false division, such as might pervert the sense. Such a sign was needed to obviate the confusion arising from the ancient practice of writing without division between words. The diastole is still occasionally used, generally in order to distinguish the pronominal forms tu, and tu, "whenever, which, from the particles tu, "thou, and tu, "when." The usual practice at present, however, is to use a space instead of the diastole. When the present shape of the comma came into use, more or less confusion between it and the diastole necessarily ensued. Also called apostrophe. See apostrophe.

4. In anc. pros., lengthening or protraction of a syllable regularly short; especially, protraction of a syllable preceding a pause or taking the lotus: as,

Ire nagabamā et teeta ignota subtra.
Ovid, Metamorph., xiv, 288.

Most cases of diastole in Latin poetry are supposed to be instances of reversion to an older pronunciation, though the pause which usually follows could of itself make good the metrical deficiency. This reversion is seen chiefly in verb-terminations with final i and r: as,

Collidit ut solent humeris portare viator.

Hovae, Satires, l. v. 90.

diastolic (di-g-stol'ik), a. [< diastole + -ic.] Pertaining to or produced by diastole.

diastoly (di-as'tō-lē), n. An obsolete form of diastole.

Diastopora (di-g-stop'ō-rā), n. [NL., for **Diastopora*, < Gr. diastopora, split up, divided (diastopora, separate: see diastasis), + stōpor, passage, pore.] The typical genus of the family Diastoporida.

Diastoporida (di-as'tō-por'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Diastopora + -ida.] A family of cyclostomatous gymnommatous polyzoans.

diastyle (di-g-stil), a. [< L. diastyle, < Gr. diastylē, having the columns wide apart (whence diastylus, the space between columns), < di, apart, + stylon, a column: see style.] In arch., pertaining to that arrangement of columns in a classical order in which the intercolumniation measures three diameters. See cut under intercolumniation.

Diastylidae (di-g-stil'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Diastyle + -idae.] A family of macrurous thoracostracous crustaceans, equivalent to the suborder Cumacea of some authors, containing remarkable annectant forms related on the one hand to schizopoda, on the other to copepoda, and exhibiting in some respects a persistence of a larval type of the higher Crustacea. They are Thoracostraca or Podophtalmia with a small cephalothoracic shield, typically 5 thoracic somites, 6 pairs of legs, of which at least the two anterior pairs are biramous or of the schizopod type, maxillipeds in 2 pairs, and the abdomen elongated, of 6 somites, and in the male bearing several pairs of swimming-feet besides the terminal appendages. Diastylis and Leucon are leading genera. As understood by recent naturalists, it is limited to Diastylis and Leptostylis; these have the integuments strongly indurated, body and tail sharply defined, and the carapace large and vaulted, with a conspicuous rostriform prominence.

Diastylis (di-as'tī-lis), n. [NL., < Gr. diastylis: see diastyle.] The typical genus of the family Diastylidae.

diasyrm (di-g-sirm), n. [< Gr. diasyrmē, disparagement, ridicule, in rhet. a figure of speech so called, < diasyrmē, disparage, ridicule, tear in pieces, < di, apart, + syrmē, drag, draw.] In rhet., a figure of speech expressing disparagement or ridicule.

diatessaron (di-g-tes'g-ron), n. [L., < Gr. diatessaron, for ἡ διὰ τεσσάρων, se. χορὴν εὐρυμηνίαν, the interval of a fourth (see diapason, diapente): τεσσάρων, gen. pl. fem. of τέσσαρες = four: see tesara and four.] 1. In Gr. and medieval music, the interval of a fourth. — 2. [Gr. ῥὴ διὰ τεσσάρων (Tatian, in Eusebius).] A harmony of the four Gospels. The first work of this kind was that of Tatian (latter half of the second century), a Christian apologist, but afterward a Gnostic.

Who would lose, in the confusion of a diatessaron, the peculiar charm which belongs to the narrative of the disciple whom Jesus loved? Macaulay, Boswell's Johnson.

3. In old phar., an electuary composed of four medicines: gentian, birthwort, bayberries, and myrrh. — Diapason diatessaron. See diapason.

diathermal (di-g-ther'mal), a. [< Gr. diá, through, + thermē, heat, + -al. Cf. diathermanous.] Same as diathermanous.

diathermanous (di-g-ther'mā-nūs), a. [< diathermanous + -ous, cf. after Gr. diathermōs, heating, < thermōs, heat.] The property of transmitting radiant heat; the quality of being diathermanous.

diathermanetty (di-g-ther'mā-nē'tē), n. [= F. diathermanetté; as diathermanous + -ēty.] Same as diathermanous.

diathermanism (di-g-ther'mā-nizm), n. [As diathermanous + -ism.] The transmission of radiant heat.

diathermanous (di-g-ther'mā-nūs), a. [< Gr. diathermōs (diathermōs), warm through, < diá, through, + thermōs, warm, heat, < thermē, heat.] Freely permeable by heat. The term is specifically applied to certain substances, such as crystalline pieces of rock-salt, etc., which suffer radiant heat to pass through them, much in the same way as transparent or diaphanous bodies allow of the passage of light. See diaphanous. Also diathermal, diathermic, diathermous.

diathermic (di-g-ther'mik), a. [As diathermal + -ic.] Same as diathermanous.

In this plate some descriptions tint the sun with a greenish hue: others make it appear a glowing red without any trace of green. The latter are by far more diathermic than the former.

Tyndall, Radiation, § 8.

diathermometer (di-g-ther'mom'ē-tēr), n. [< Gr. diá, through, + thermōs, heat, + metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the thermal resistance of a substance by noting the amount of heat which it transmits.

diathermons (di-g-ther'mūs), a. [< Gr. diá, through, + thermōs, heat.] Same as diathermanous.

The diathermons forenoon atmosphere.

Amer. Jour. Sci., Whole No. cxxix, p. 300.

diathesis (di-g-thē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. diathesis, arrangement, disposition, state, condition (of body or mind), < diathēva, arrange, dispose, place separately, < diá, apart, + thēva, place, put. Cf. thesis.] 1. In med., a predisposing condition or habit of body; constitutional predisposition: as, a strumous or scrofulous diathesis. She inherited a nervous diathesis as well as a large dower of intellectual and æsthetic graces.

E. H. Clarke, Sex in Education, p. 98.

2. A predisposing condition or state of mind; a mental tendency; hence, a predisposing condition or tendency in anything.

In whichever rank you see corruption, be assured it equally pervades all ranks—be assured it is the symptom of a bad social diathesis.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 264.

All signs fall in a drought, because the predisposition, the diathesis, is so strongly toward fair weather.

The Century, XXV, 675.

diathetic (di-g-thet'ik), a. [< diathesis (-thet) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or dependent upon diathesis; constitutional: as, diathetic tumors.

Diathetic diseases: that is to say, diseases dependent upon a peculiar disposition of body or mind, or both.

B. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 508.

diathetically (di-g-thet'ī-kal-ē), adv. In a diathetic manner; as regards diathesis, or constitutional predisposition; constitutionally.

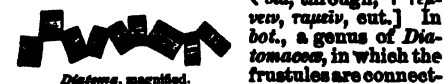

Out of the serous layer is evolved the whole voluntary motor apparatus of bones, muscles, aponeuroses, ligaments, and serous tissues; so that . . . they are related to each other nutritionally and diathetically.

E. C. Menn, Psychol. Med., p. 346.

diatite (di-g-tīt), n. [< diatite (-tīt) + -ite.] A cement composed of a mixture of shelles and finely divided silica.

diatom (di-g-tōm), n. A member of the Diatomaceæ. — Diatom prism. See prism.

Diatoma (di-at'ō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. as if **diatoma*, verbal adj. of diatēva, cut through, < diá, through, + temnō, rapier, cut.] In bot., a genus of Diatomaceæ, in which the frustules are connected together by their angles, forming a zigzag chain, and the valves composing them only meet at the edges without overlapping. There are about a dozen species, found on submerged plants and stones.

Diatoma, magnified.

Diatomaceæ (di-g-tō-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Diatoma + -aceæ.] An order of microscopic unicellular algae, much resembling the Desmidiaceæ, from which they are distinguished by a silification of the cell-wall and by the presence of a brownish pigment which conceals the green of the chlorophyll. The cells are either isolated or united into threads, etc., and often secrete a thin jelly in which they live socially. Each frustule is composed of two separate and similar parts (valves), the edges of which usually fit one over the other like the lid of a box. Reproduction takes place, as in the desmids, in two ways: by division and by sexual conjugation. Diatoms exist in all parts of the world in immense numbers at the bottom of the sea and of fresh water, and are also found attached to the submerged parts of aquatic plants, etc., and among mosses and in other damp localities. There are many genera, and the number of known species exceeds 1,500. They vary greatly in the form and markings of the valves, which are often exquisitely sculptured, forming beautiful objects under the microscope and testing its highest powers. In some species the lines are found to equal 125,000 to the inch. Extensive fossil deposits of the siliceous remains of Diatomaceæ occur in various localities, as at Billin in Bohemia, and in Virginia, Nevada, and California. They are sometimes used as polishing-powder. They are abundant in guano. Also called Beilertaceæ.

diatomacean (di-g-tō-mā'sē-an), n. [< diatomaceæ + -an.] In bot., a plant of the order Diatomaceæ.

diatomaceous (di-g-tō-mā'shi-us), a. [< Diatomaceæ + -ous.] In bot., belonging to or resembling Diatomaceæ.

During the voyage of the Challenger, a . . . diatomacean ooze was found, as a pale straw-colored deposit, in certain parts of the Southern Ocean. Huxley, Physiol., p. 232.

diatomic (di-g-tom'ik), a. [< Gr. di, two, + atomos, atom, + -ic.] In chem., consisting of two atoms: as, a diatomic radical: specifically applied to hydrates which have two hydrogen atoms united to the nucleus radical by oxygen. It is these hydrogen atoms alone which are easily replaced by metallic bases or other radicals.

The alcohols and fat acids are monatomic, the glycols are diatomic, and the glycerines are triatomic compounds. J. P. Cooke, Chem. Philoa., p. 117.

diatomiferous (di-g-tō-mif'ē-rus), a. [< NL. Diatoma + L. ferre, = L. beur, + -ous.] Containing or yielding diatoms.

diatomine (di-at'ō-min), n. [< diatom + -ine.] The buff or yellowish-brown pigment which colors diatoms and brown algae, obscuring the chlorophyll. Also called phyco-xanthine.

diatomist (di-at'ō-mist), n. [< diatom + -ist.] A botanist who has made a special study of the Diatomaceæ.

diatomite (di-at'ō-mit), n. [< diatom + -ite.] Diatomaceous earth; infusorial earth.

diatomoscope (di-g-tōm'ō-skōp), n. [< NL. Diatoma + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument for the examination of diatoms.

diatomous (di-at'ō-mūs), a. [< Gr. as if **diatōmos*, verbal adj. of diatēva, cut through: see Diatoma.] In mineral, having crystals with one distinct diagonal cleavage.

diatonic (di-g-ton'ik), a. [= F. diatonique = Sp. diatónico = Pg. diatónico (cf. D. G. diatonisch = Dan. Sv. diatonisk).] < LL. diatonica, < Gr. diatōnikos, also simply diatōnos (se. évōs, évōs, class), the diatonic scale, neut. of diatōnos, extending through, < diatēva, stretch through, extend, < diá, through, + temnō, stretch, > róvōs, tone: see tone.] 1. In Gr. music, noting one of the three standard tetrachords, consisting of four tones at the successive intervals of a half tone, a tone, and a tone: distinguished from chromatic and enharmonic. See tetrachord.

— 2. In modern music, using the tones, intervals, or harmonies of the standard major or minor scales without chromatic alteration. — Diatonic instruments, instruments constructed to produce only the tones of the standard major or minor scales of their fundamental tone. — Diatonic melody, a melody without modulation. — Diatonic modulation, a modulation to a closely related key. See modulation. — Diatonic progression, a melodic passage in which the tones of the standard scale, major or minor, are used in succession upward or downward. — Diatonic scale, a standard scale, major or minor. See scale.

diatonically (di-g-ton'ī-kal-ē), adv. In a diatonic manner.

diatonicus (di-at'ō-nūs), a. [< Gr. diatōnos, extending through: see diatonic.] Extending from front to back: in masonry, said of stones which extend entirely through a wall so that they appear on both sides of it.

diatriba, n. Same as diatribe.

I have read y learned diatriba concerning Prayer, & do exceedingly prayee your method.

Evelyn, To Mr. E. Thurland.

diatribe (di-g-trib), n. [Formerly also, as L., diatriba; = F. diatribe = Sp. diatriba = Pg. diatriba = It. diatriba, < ML. diatriba, a disputation (L. diatriba, a school), < Gr. diatribē, a wearing away, pastime, way of spending time, a school, a discussion, waste of time, < diatribē, rub away, waste, spend time, discuss, < diá, through, + tribē, rub: see tribe.] 1. A continued discourse or disputation.

I have made . . . a diatribe on the subject of descriptive poetry. Lowell, Among my Books, 3d ser., p. 182.

Specifically — 2. A bitter and violent criticism; a strain of invective.

Diatomaceæ, magnified.

a, young individuals of Cocconeis lacunulosus; b, longitudinal view of a single frustule of Stictocella interrupta, showing striae; c, Cocconeis aculeata, viewed obliquely to a filament of Cocconeis; d, Stictocella diatrypa; e, many individuals united laterally to form a strap-shaped colony, with a lateral pedicel. (From Le Monnier and Deshayes's 'Traité général de Botanique'.)

Her continued diallele against intellectual people.
R. C. Clarke.

A really insolent diallele, . . . which Knox boasted himself to have launched at the Duke and the Marquis of Winchester.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xxi.

diallele (di-á-le-le), n. [< diallele + -le.] One who writes or utters dialleles.

Diallele (di-á-le-le), n. [NL., < Gr. diallele, through, + trápeza, a hole, < trápeza, bore, pierce.] A genus of gigantic ratite fossil birds from the Wahatch group of the Eocene of New Mexico, supposed to be the same as Gastornis (which see). The type-species is D. gigantea. Cope.

diallele, n. Plural of diallele.

diallele (di-á-le-le), n.; pl. dialleles (-li). [< L. diallele, a double course, < Gr. diallele, a double pipe or channel, a double course, < di-, two-, + allos, a pipe, flute.] 1. An ancient Greek musical instrument, consisting of two single flutes, either similar or different, so joined at the mouthpiece that they could be played together. See cut under aulos.—2. In anc. Greek games, a double course, in which the racers passed around a goal at the end of the course, and returned to the starting-place.

Besides the foot-race in which the course was traversed only once, there were now the diallele or double course and the "long" foot-race (dolichos).

Encyc. Brit., XVII. 768.

3. An ancient Greek itinerary measure, the equivalent of two stadia.

diallele (di-á-le-le), a. and n. [< Gr. di-, two-, + allos, axis.] 1. a. Having two axes, as a sponge-spicule. See extract under diallele.

II. n. A sponge-spicule with two axes.

diallele (di-á-le-le), n. pl. [< Gr. diallele + -le.] Sponge-spicules having two axes.

When one of the rays of this triact spicule becomes rudimentary, diallele can theoretically be produced. It is however advantageous to consider the diallele spicule as part of the trianthus.

Von Lendenfeld, Proc. Zool. Soc., 1886, p. 180.

diallele (di-á-le-le), a. [< Impropr. diallele; < Gr. diallele, disjunctive, < diallele, disjoin (cf. di-á-le-le), < diallele, the disjunct system of music, < diallele, apart, + trápeza = L. junctura, join: see disjunct, join, seignia, etc.] Disjunct: in anc. Gr. music, applied to two successive tetrachords that were separated by the interval of a tone, and also to the tone by which such tetrachords were separated.

diallele (di-á-le-le), a. Improper form of diallele.

diallele (di-á-le-le), n. [< Gr. diallele, disjunction, < diallele, disjoin: see diallele.] In anc. Gr. music, the separation of two successive tetrachords by the interval of a tone, and also the tone by which such tetrachords were separated.

diallele [< di- + allos (to).] In chem., a prefix signifying that a compound contains a group consisting of phenyl ( $C_6H_5$ ) united with a radical consisting of two nitrogen atoms.

diallele (di-á-le-le), n.; pl. dialleles (-ma-tá). [< Gr. diallele, a girdle, partition, lobby, < diallele, gird round, < diallele, through, + trápeza, gird: see round.] In the anc. Gr. theater, a passage usually dividing the auditorium longitudinally at about the middle, cutting the radial flights of steps, and serving to facilitate communication. In some examples there are more than one diallele, and in some small or rude theaters none is present. In the Roman theater it was called praescenium.

Theater of Epidaurus, Greece, designed by Polykleitos. D.D. diallele; K, orchestra, or bema. (From the Proceedings (Hesperus) for 1873 of the Archaeological Society of Athens.)

diallele (di-á-le-le), v. pret. and pp. dialled, ppr. dialling. [< diallele, < Gr. diallele, a var. of diallele.] To dip, v. Cf. diallele. I. trans. To dip.

And James blinde them on an,
And had them dip their cuppen alle
And her dille burne he in halle.
Early Eng. Metrical Romances (ed. J. Small), p. 181.

II. trans. To dip; specifically, in angling, to dabble.

In dipping for roach, dace, or chub, I must not let my motion be swift: when I see any of them coming towards the bait, I must make two or three short returns, and then let it slide gently with the stream, if possible to towards the fish. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 107, note.

diallele (di-á-le-le), n. [< diallele, < Gr. diallele.] 1. A dip.—2. A depression in the ground.—3. A valley. [Prov. Eng.]

diallele (di-á-le-le), n. [< diallele.] A pool; a dub. [Scotch.]

The dille were full; the roads foul.
Gait, Annals of the Parish, p. 312.

diallele (di-á-le-le), n. [< diallele, origin obscure.] 1. One of the small bones, or huckle-bones, of a sheep's leg; the knee-pan or the ankle-bone. See astragalus. [Prov. Eng.].—2. pl. A children's game, consisting in throwing up the small bones of the legs of sheep, or small stones, and catching them first on the palm and then on the back of the hand. As played with pebbles, this game is also called chuckstones, jackstones. In Scotland called chuckles, chucks, or chuckie-stones, and played with pebbles. 3. pl. Money. [Eng. slang.]

Pray come with more cash in your pocket:
Make nunky surrender his dille.

diallele, div. [< diallele, < Skt. diallele, island.] The final element of many place-names in India and the East: as, Serendib (an old name of Ceylon), Maldives, Laccadives.

Dibamides (di-bam-i-des), n. pl. [< diallele, < diallele.] A family of true lacertilians, typified by the genus Dibamus. They have the clavicles dilated proximally, and frequently loop-shaped, the premaxillary double, no interorbital septum, no columella cranii, no arches, and no osteodermal plates.

Dibamus (di-bam-i-des), n. [< diallele, < diallele, post. for di-á-le-le, on two legs, < di-, two-, + á-le-le, a step, pace: see bema.] A genus of lizards, typical of the family Dibamidae.

dibasic (di-bá-sik), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + basia, base, + -ic.] Same as bibasic.

dibatis (di-bá-tis), n. [< diallele.] In logic, same as dimaris.

dibber (di-bér), n. [< diallele, < diallele for dip + -er. Cf. dibble.] 1. An instrument for dibbling; a dibble, or a tool having a series of dibles or teeth for making holes in the ground.—2. An iron tool with a sharp-pointed end of steel, or the pointed end of a claw-bar, used by miners and others for making holes.

The pointed ends of claw-bars are often slightly bent, to facilitate getting a pinch and levering in certain positions. The end . . . is called a dibber, for making holes. Wm. Morgan, Man. of Mining Tools, p. 188.

dibble (di-bil), n. [*< ME. dibille, debille, *dibel*; appar. < diallele, < diallele, equiv. to -er.] A pointed tool, often merely a short, stout, pointed stick, used in gardening and agriculture to make holes in the ground for planting seeds or bulbs, setting out plants, etc.

The dibble in the earth to set one slip of them.
Shak., W. T., iv. 2.

Take an old man's advice, youth, . . . bend thy sword into a pruning-hook, and make a dibble of thy dagger.
Scott, Abbot, xxviii.

dibble (di-bil), v. t.; pret. and pp. dibbled, ppr. dibbling. [< diallele, < diallele.] To plant with a dibble, or to make holes in for planting seeds, etc.; make holes or indentations in, as if with a dibble.

An' he's brought fouth o' foreign leeks,
An' dibbled them in his yardie.
Remains of Nicholas Song, p. 144.

A skipping deer,
With pointed hoof dibbling the globe, prepared
The soft receptacle, in which, secure,
Thy rudiments should sleep the winter through.
Cooper, Yardley Oak (1791).

Thaw sets in—
After an hour a dripping sound is heard
In all the forests, and the soft-strewn snow
Under the trees is dibbled thick with holes.
F. Arnold, Bolder Dead.

dibble (di-bil), v. t.; pret. and pp. dibbled, ppr. dibbling. [< diallele, < diallele.] To dip or let the bait fall gently into the water, as in angling.

This stone fly, then, we dape or dibble with, as with the drake.
Ottom, in Walton's Angler.

Man in a small boat fishing: ask him civilly what he's doing. He answers: "I'm dibbling for chub." . . . All the villagers dibbled. F. C. Burnand, Happy Thoughts, v.

dibbler (di-bil-ér), n. One who dibles, or an instrument for dibbling.

dibbling (di-bil-ing), n. [< diallele, < diallele.] The act of dipping, as in angling.

Not an inch of your line being to be suffered to touch the water in dibbling, it may be allowed to be the strongest. Ottom, in Walton's Angler, ii. 141.

dib-hole (di-bil-hól), n. In coal-mining, the lowest part of the mine, and especially of the shaft, into which the water is drained or conducted so that it may be raised to the surface by pumping or otherwise. [Lancashire, Eng.] Called swamp in Cornwall and in the United States, and lodge in various coal-mining districts of England.

diblastula (di-blas-tá-lá), n.; pl. diblastulae (-lá). [< NL. < Gr. di-, two-, + NL. blastula, q. v.] The two-cell-layered sac into which the single cells or plastids constituting the germs of the Enterosoa first develop. E. E. Lankester.

dibothrian (di-bó-thr-i-an), a. and n. [< Gr. di-, two-, + bothros, a pit.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dibothridae.

II. n. One of the Dibothridae; a tapeworm with only two facets or fosses on the head, as in the genera Dibothrium and Bothrioccephalus. The broad tapeworm, Bothrioccephalus latius, is a dibothrian.

Dibothridae (di-bó-thr-i-á-de), n. pl. [< NL. < Gr. di-, two-, + bothros, a pit, trench.] A family of cestoid flatworms, or tapeworms, having only two suckers on the head: a synonym of Bothrioccephalidae.

dibrach, dibrachys (di-brák-'is), n. [< LL. dibrachys, < LGR. dibrachys (= LL. bibrachis), of two short syllables, < di- (= L. bi-), two-, + brachys = L. brevis, short.] In anc. pros., a foot consisting of two short syllables; a pyrrhic.

dibranch (di-brangk), n. One of the Dibranchiata.

A whole lobe or arm of a Decapod or Octopod Dibranch. E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 674.

Dibranchiata (di-brang-ki-á-tá), n. pl. [< NL. neut. pl. of dibranchiatus: see dibranchiatus.]

An order of aceta-buliferous cephalopods, containing the decapod and octopod Cephalopoda. It is one of the prime divisions of Cephalopoda (the other being Tetradobranchiata), having two gills in the mantle-cavity, from 8 to 10 arms bearing suckers, a complete infundibulum or funnel, and usually an ink-bag, with, or more frequently without, a shell. (See cut under ink-bag.) All the living cephalopods, excepting the pearly nautilus, belong to the Dibranchiata, such as cuttlefishes, squids, calamaries, etc., together with the paper-nautilus. (See cuts under argonaut and Argonautidae.)

Eleutherozoa are fossil forms of the order. The order is generally divided into two suborders, Octopoda or Octo-, and Decapoda or Deca-. Also called Cryptodibranchiata. See also cuts under belemnite and cuttlefish.

dibranchiate (di-brang-ki-á-té), a. and n. [< NL. dibranchiatus, < Gr. di-, two-, + brachys, gills.] 1. a. Having two gills; specifically, in cephalopods, pertaining to the Dibranchiata.

II. n. A cephalopod of the order Dibranchiata.

dibs (dibs), n. [< Ar.] A thick molasses or syrup made in Syria by boiling down grape-juice; also, syrup or honey of dates.

dibstone (di-bis-tón), n. 1. A little stone or bone used in the game of dibs.—2. pl. Same as dibs. I have seen little girls exercise whole hours together, and take abundance of pains to be expert at dibstone. Locke.

dibulous (di-bis-'shus), a. [< L. dibulus (diabolus), talking sharply or satirically, witty (< diabolus, say: see diabolus), + -ulus.] Satirical; pert; saucy. Ins. Dict.

dibulosity (di-bis-'i-ti), n. [< L. dibulosity (t-), railery, wit, < diabolus (diabolus), witty: see di-

This gave a sort of potent dignity to his repartees.

Groves, Spiritual Quixote, I. 2.

Dicoides (di-oid'-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicoides + -ides.] An artificial family of oscine passerine birds, named from the genus Dicoides, usually merged in Neotornithidae. It includes, according to some authors, 19 genera of chiefly Indian, Australian, and Polynesian birds, resembling the sun-birds in many respects.

Dicology (di-ol'-o-jē), n. [LL. dicologia, < Gr. dikologia, a plea in defense, < dikaō, right, just, neut. dikaios, a right, a just claim (< dika, justice), + -logia, < lyō, speak; see -ology.] In rhet., a mode of defense by which the accused admits the act charged as stated, but seeks to justify it as lawful, or by pleading mitigating circumstances.

Dicoum (di-ō'-um), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817).]

An extensive genus of Indian and East Indian tenuirostral passerine birds, of the family Neotornithidae and subfamily Drepapinae; a group of small sun-birds, having a slender, acute, arcuate bill, the tarsi short, and the plumage more or less red. D.

Swallow Sun-bird (Dicoum atramentum).

atramentum of Australia has a relatively broad and flattened beak, like a swallow's (whence the name), and is the type of a subgenus Microchalcidion. It was formerly called the swallow-warbler. Also written Dicoum. Strickland, 1843.

dicarbonate (di-kār'-bō-nāt), n. [ < di- + carbonate.] In chem., same as bicarbonate.

dicarpellary (di-kār'-pē-lē-rē), a. [ < di- + carpell + -ary.] In bot., composed of two carpels.

dicast (di'-kast), n. [ < Gr. δικαστής, a judge (in Athens rather a juryman, the presiding judge being δ κριτής; see critic), < δικάω, judge, < dika, justice.] In ancient Athens, one of 6,000 citizens who were chosen by lot annually to sit as judges, in greater or less number according to the importance of the case, and whose functions corresponded to those of the modern juryman and judge combined. The 6,000 dicasts were divided by lot into 10 sections of 600 each, with a supplementary section of 1,000, from which accidental deficiencies or absences were supplied. The sections were assigned from time to time to the different courts; and, according to the character of the case to be tried, a single section sat, or two or more sections together, or a fractional part of a section. In cases pertaining to religion or military matters, etc., trial was sometimes had before a selected panel of dicasts (a special or struck jury), who sat as experts. In cases of importance one of the thymothetes served as president of the court. Also dikast.

dicastery (di-kas'-tē-rē), n. [ < Gr. δικαστήριον, a court of justice, < δικάω, judge; see dicast.] In Gr. antiq., a court of justice; especially, in Athens, one of the courts in which dicasts sat; hence, the court or body of dicasts themselves. The dicastery differed from the modern jury in that the former may be regarded as the whole body of citizens represented by a numerous section sitting in judgment, while the jury is a group of peers, originally also friends or acquaintances, of the parties concerned.

dicatalextic (di-kat'-g-ek'-tik), a. [ < Gr. δικατάλετος (Hephæstion), < di-, two, double, + κατάλετος, catalextic, < κατάλειψω, leave off; see catalextic.] In pros., characterized by double catalexis, both interior and final; having an incomplete foot both in the middle and at the end. The dactylic pentameter is an example of a dicatalextic line, the third and the last foot both being incomplete:

— — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — —

See catalextic and procatalextic.

dicatalexis (di-kat'-g-ek'-sis), n. [NL. (cf. LGr. δικατάλεξις — Marinus Victorinus), < Gr. di-, two, double, + κατάλεξις, catalexis; see catalexis.] In pros., concurrence of interior and final catalexis; incompleteness of both a middle and a final foot in a line.

diēs (diē), n. pl. [ < ME. diēs, dyce (sometimes in double pl. dyces), irreg. spelling of dyce, dyce, diēs, diēs, pl. of diēs, diēs: see diēs.] 1. The plural of diēs. — 2. A game with dice. See diēs. diēs (diē), v.; pret. and pp. diēd, dyed. [ < ME. dyces, play with dice, also cut into cubes or squares, < dyce, dyce, dice: see diēs, n.] 1. intrane. To play with dice.

Against they diēs as fast, the poorest rogues of all Will sit them down in open field, and there to gaming fall. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 288.

1 . . . diēd not above seven times a week.

Shak., I Hen. IV., III. 2.

II. trans. 1. To cut into cubes or squares. — 2. To sew a kind of waved pattern on (the border of a garment). — 3. To decorate with a pattern (especially a woven one) resembling cubes seen diagonally—that is, with hexagons so shaded by the run of the thread as to resemble cubes so placed; less properly, to weave with a pattern of squares or lozenges touching one another.—To diēs away, to lose at dice; gamble away. [Rare.]

An unthrill, that will diēs away his skin, Rather than want to stake at ordinaries. Shakley, The Wedding, v. 2.

diēs-box (diē'-boks), n. 1. A box from which dice are thrown in gaming, usually in the form of a cylinder contracted in the middle.

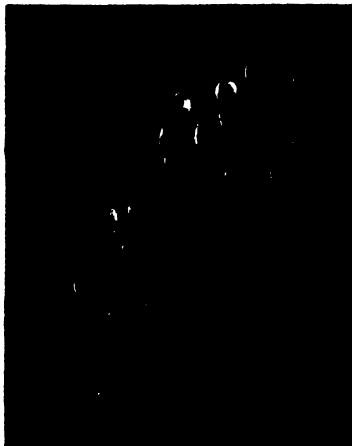

The common method of throwing the dice is with a hollow cylinder of wood, called the diēs-box, into which they are put, and these, being first shaken together, thrown out upon the table. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 403.

2. A species of insulator for telegraph-wires, shaped like a box for throwing dice, along the axis of which the wire is carried.

diēs-coal (diē'-kōl), n. In coal-mining, certain layers of coal which break readily into small cubical fragments resembling dice in form. [Leicestershire, Eng.]

dicellate (di-sel'-āt), a. [ < Gr. δικελλα, a two-pronged hoe (< di-, two-, + κέλλω, drive, urge), + -ate.] Two-pronged, as a sponge-spicule.

Dicentra (di-sen'-trē), n. [NL., < Gr. δίκεντρος, with two stings or points, < di-, two-, + έντρον, a point, sting, spur; see center.] A genus of delicate perennial herbs, of the natural order Fumariaceae, of about a dozen species, natives of North America and eastern and central Asia. The species have glaucous dissected leaves and a heart-shaped or two-spurred corolla. The squirrel-corn, Bleeding-heart (Dicentra spectabilis).

D. canadensis, and Dutchman's-breeches, D. cucullaria, are common species of the northern United States. The bleeding-heart, D. spectabilis, a very ornamental species from northern China, is frequent in gardens. Also called Dicentra.

dicophalous (di-sēf'-a-lus), a. [ < Gr. δικοφαλος, two-headed, < di-, two-, + φαλος, head.] Having two heads on one body; bicipitate.

diēs-play (diē'-plā), n. The game of dice.

Diēs-play, and such other foolish and pernicious games, they know not. Shak., Two Merry Utopians (tr. by Robinson), II. 4.

diēs-player (diē'-plā'-er), n. [ < ME. diēsplayer; < diēs + player.] One who plays at dice; a dieer.

diēs (diē'-er), n. [ < ME. dyer, dyer, < dyē, dice: see diēs, v.] One who plays at dice; a gamester.

As false as diēs' oaths. Shak., Hamlet, III. 4.

Dicorac (dis'-g-ras), n. [NL., < Gr. διχορακ, a double horn: see dicorac.] 1. A genus of dimyarian bivalves, having subequal valves with spirally prolonged umbones and a very thick hinge, with prominent teeth, two in one valve and one in the other, occurring in the Oölite, and referred to the family Chamidae: named from the pair of beaks twisted like a ram's horns. Lamarck, 1805.—2. A genus of worms. Endolphi, 1810.

dicorion (di-sēr'-i-on), n. [MGr. δικοριον, < Gr. διχοριον, two-horned (διχορακ, a double horn), < di-, two-, + ρακ, a horn.] A candlestick with two lights, representing the two natures of Christ, used by the Greek bishops in blessing the people. See tricerion.

dicorac (dis'-g-ras), a. [NL., < Gr. διχορακ (διχορακ, διχορακ), also διχορακ (διχορακ), two-horned (cf. Dicorac), < di-, two-, + ρακ, horn. Cf. dicorac.] In entom., having a pair of developed antennae.

diēt. A corrupt form found only in the following passage, usually explained as standing for diēt (do it).

Much good diēt thy good heart, Apemantus. Shak., T. of A., I. 2.

Dichæta (di-kē'-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. διχæτα, + NL. chæta, q. v.] A division of brachycerous dipterous insects, containing those two-winged flies which have the proboscis or sucker composed of two pieces. It contains the family Muscidae and others. The common house-fly is an example.

The number of pieces composing the haustellum varies—two, four, or six; and on this character Macquart has founded his arrangement, naming his divisions Dichæta, Tetrachæta, and Hexachæta, respectively.

Panzer, Noël, Class., p. 123.

dichætos (di-kē'-tus), a. [As Dichæta + -ous.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dichæta.

dichas (di'-kas), n. [Gr. διχας (διχας), the half, < διχα, in two, < διχ (di-), twice: see di-.] A half foot in ancient Greek long measure. The Attic measure is supposed to have been 5.94 inches, the late Egyptian (Philæterian) 7 inches, English measure.

dichasia, n. Plural of dichasium.

dichasial (di-kā'-si-āl), a. [ < dichasium + -al.] In bot., pertaining to or resembling a dichasium.

The dichasial form of inflorescence. Encyc. Brit., IV. 124.

dichasium (di-kā'-si-um), n.; pl. dichasia (-sē). [NL., < Gr. διχασίον, division: see dichasias.] In bot., a cyme having two main axes.

dichastasis (di-kas'-tā-sis), n. [NL., improp. for dichasias, < Gr. διχασίον, division, half, < διχασίον, διχασίον, divide, < διχα, in two, < διχ (di-), twice: see di-.] Spontaneous subdivision.

dichastic (di-kas'-tik), a. [ < Gr. διχασίον, division; cf. dichastasis.] Capable of subdividing spontaneously. Imp. Dicel. [Rare.]

diche, n. and c. A Middle English form of dich.

Dicholesthiidae (di-kē'-les-thi'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicholesthium + -idae.] A family of siphonostomous parasitic crustaceans or fish-lice, typified by the genus Dicholesthium, having abortive limbs. Also written Dicholesthiidae.

Dicholesthium (di-kē'-les-thi-um), n. [NL., < (?) Gr. διχολέστης, also διχολέστης, eleven-hoofed, orig. 'two-parted' (neut. διχολέστης, forerunner; < di-, two- + χολέστης, a hoof, eleven hoof, claw, spur, forked probe, notch, etc., orig. anything parted, < χαίρω in χαίρω, gape, yawn, part), + τόβιον, eat.]

Dicholesthium sturionis, magnified.

The typical genus of fish-lice of the family Dicholesthiidae. Also written Dicholesthium. Hermann, 1804.

Dichotomida (di-ki-ton'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. διχότομος, < δι-, two-, + χότομος, to cut (chiton), + -ida.] A group of tuniciaries, ascidians, or sea-squirrels, equivalent to the order Ascidioidea.

dichlamydeous (di-kla-mid'-s-us), a. [Gr. di-, two-, + χλαμύς (χλαμύδ-), a cloak (see chlamys), + -ous.] In bot., having a double perianth, consisting of both calyx and corolla.

dichlorid (di-klo'-rid), n. Same as bichlorid.

dichloro-methane (di-klo'-rō-mē-thān), n. [Gr. di-, two-, + μέθανος (μέθαν-), methane, chlorid.] Methylene dichlorid.

dicho- [Gr. di-, combining form of di-, in two, apart, < δίς (di-), twice, two-: see di-.] The first element in several scientific terms, meaning 'in two parts', 'in pairs'.

Dichobune (di-kō-bū'-nē), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, in two, + βουνός, a hill, height, mound, prob. a Cynaeic word.] 1. A fossil genus of non-ruminant or bunodont artiodactyl quadrupeds of Eocene age, type of the family Dichobunidae: so called from their bunodont molars.—2. (di'-kō-būn). [L. c.] An animal of this genus or of the family Dichobunidae.

Dichobunidae (di-kō-bū-ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dichobune + -idae.] A family of extinct artiodactyl quadrupeds. They are related to the anoplotheres, but have the body somewhat leporiform, with the hind limbs disproportionately longer than the fore, and the teeth more specialized than in the Anoplotheriidae. The teeth are 44 in number, with 6 peralunate upper incisors. The dichobunes are supposed to have had a diffuse placenta and a tripartite stomach with no developed pauciterium, and hence to have been non-ruminant. The dentition is of the pattern called bunodont. The leading genera are Dichobune and Dichodon, from the Eocene.

dichogamic (di-kō-gam'-ik), a. [Gr. di-, two-, + χῶμα (χῶμα-), marriage.] In bot., exhibiting or characterized by dichogamy.

dichogamous (di-kō-gā-mus), a. [Gr. di-, in two, + χῶμα, marriage.] In bot., exhibiting or characterized by dichogamy.

With dichogamous plants, early or late flowers on the same individual may intercross.

Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 250.

dichogamy (di-kog'-ā-mi), n. [As dichogamous + -y.] In bot., a provision in hermaphrodite flowers to prevent self-fertilization by a difference in the time of maturity of the anthers and stigma. It is distinguished as proterandrous or proterogynous, according as the anthers or the stigmas are the first to become mature.

The same end (cross-fertilization) is gained by dichogamy or the maturation of the reproductive elements of the same flower at different periods.

Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 252.

Dicholophidae (di-kō-lof'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicholophus + -idae.] A family of birds, taking name from the genus Dicholophus: a synonym of Cariamidae (which see). J. J. Kaup, 1850.

Dicholophus (di-kō-lof'-us), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1811), < Gr. di-, in two, + λόφος, a crest, ridge.] A genus of birds: same as Cariama, 2.

dichord (di'-kōrd), n. [Gr. διχορδον, an instrument with two strings, neut. of διχορδος, two-stringed, < di-, two-, + χορδή, string: see chord, cord.] 1. An ancient musical instrument, of the lute or harp class, having two strings.—2. A general term for musical instruments having two strings to each note.

dichoree (di-kō-rē), n. Same as dichoreus.

dichoreus (di-kō-rē'-us), n.; pl. dichorei (-i). [L., also, later, dichorius, < Gr. διχορεος, < di-, two-, + χορεος, choreus.] A double choreus or trochee; a trochaic dipody regarded as a single compound foot. Also called dichoree and di-trochee (which see).

dichotomal (di-kot'-ō-mal), a. [As dichotomous + -al.] In bot., growing in or pertaining to the forks of a dichotomous stem: as, a dichotomal flower.

dichotomic (di-kō-tom'-ik), a. [As dichotomous + -ic.] Same as dichotomous.—Dichotomic synoptical table. Same as dichotomous key (which see, under dichotomous).

dichotomically (di-kō-tom'-i-kal-i), adv. Same as dichotomously.

dichotomize, v. See dichotomise.

dichotomist (di-kot'-ō-mist), n. [Gr. διχοτομία + -ist.] One who dichotomizes, or classifies by subdivision into pairs.

These dichotomists . . . would wrest . . . whatsoever doth not aptly fall within these dichotomies.

Dacon, On Learning, VI. ii. § 1.

dichotomisation (di-kot'-ō-mi-zā'-shn), n. [Gr. διχοτομία + -ation.] Division into two parts; separation or classification by dual or binary subdivision.

dichotomise (di-kot'-ō-miz), v.; pret. and pp. dichotomized, ppr. dichotomizing. [Gr. διχοτομίζω, cut in two (διχοτομίζω, adj., cut in two), + -ize: see dichotomous.] 1. trans. To cut into two parts; divide into pairs; specifically, to classify by subdivision into pairs.

II. intrans. To separate into pairs; become dichotomous.

The leaf in Dracunculus has a very peculiar shape: it consists of a number of lobes which are disposed upon a stalk which is more or less forked (tends more or less to dichotomise). Nature, XXX. 572.

Also spelled dichotomise.

dichotomous (di-kot'-ō-mus), a. [L.L. dichotomos, < Gr. διχοτομος, cutting in two, proparoxytone διχοτομος, cut in two, divided equally, < di-, in two, + τέμνω, ταύω, cut.] Pertaining to or consisting of a pair or pairs; divided into two, or having a dual arrangement or order.

Take the classification of the sciences, and it is seen that the process begins at its widest sweep with a pure dichotomous division: it is the contrast of the Abstract and the Concrete. W. L. Davidson, Mind, XII. 251.

Specifically—(a) In bot., regularly dividing by pairs from below upward; two-forked: as, a dichotomous stem. A good example of a dichotomous stem is furnished by the mistletoe. See cut under dichotomy.

It is in this manner that the dichotomous character is given to the entire stipes. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 294.

(b) In zool.: (1) Branching by pairs; bifurcous; bifurcate; forked: as, the dichotomous division of a deer's antlers; the dichotomous foot of a crustacean. (2) Distichous; bifurcous; two-rowed or two-ranked; parted in the middle: as, the dichotomous hairs of a squirrel's tail. (c) In classification, binary; dual; arranged in two ranks or series; opposed by pairs, as a set of characters, or a number of objects characterized by dichotomization. Also dichotomie.—Dichotomous key or table, in nat. hist., a tabular guide to the orders, genera, etc., as of a flora, arranged artificially, so that by a series of contrasts and exclusions the desired order is finally reached.

dichotomously (di-kot'-ō-mus-li), adv. In a dichotomous manner; by subdivision into two parts or into pairs. Also dichotomically.

All the Metopopoda possess a larynx, a trachea, and one or two lungs. The bronchi do not divide dichotomously, as they do in Mammalia. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 267.

dichotomy (di-kot'-ō-mi), n.; pl. dichotomies (-miz). [Gr. διχοτομία, a cutting in two, < διχοτομίζω, cutting in two: see dichotomous.] A cutting in two; division into two parts or into twos; subdivision into halves or pairs; the state of being dichotomous.

Nor contented with a general breach or dichotomy with their church, [they] do subdivide and mince themselves almost into atoms. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 8.

Specifically—(a) In logic, the division of a whole into two parts; binary classification. Ramus revived, against the Aristotelians, the Platonic doctrine, which has had many adherents, that all classification should be by dichotomy. But the opinion has found little favor since Kant.

We cannot by any logical dichotomies accurately express relations which, in Nature, graduate into each other insensibly. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 75.

(b) In astron., that phase of the moon in which it appears bisected or shows only half its disk, as at the quadratures. (c) In bot., a mode of branching by constant forking, as is shown in some stems, the venation of some leaves, etc. This mode of branching in plants is variously modified, as when only one of the branches at each fork becomes further developed, in which case the dichotomy is said to be sympodial. If these undeveloped branches lie always upon the same side of the axis, the sympodial dichotomy is helictoid; if alternately upon opposite sides, it is scorpioid.—Argument from dichotomy, one of the arguments of Zeno the Eleatic against plurality and magnitude. Anything having magnitude must consist of two parts, and those again of two, ad infinitum. Thus, the ultimate parts have no magnitude, and hence not the whole.

dichotriane (di-kō-tri'-ēn), n. [Gr. διχα, in two, + τρίαινα, a trident: see triene.] In the nomenclature of sponge-spicules, a dichotomous triene; a cladose rhabdus whose three cladi or arms divide into two. See triene.

The arms of a triene may bifurcate (dichotriane) once, twice, or oftener, or they may trifurcate.

Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 417.

dichroic (di-kro'-ik), a. [Gr. δίχρως, two-colored (see dichroous), + -ic.] 1. Characterized by dichroism: as, a dichroic crystal.—2. Same as dichromatic.

dichroism (di-kro'-izm), n. [Gr. δίχροος + -ism.] In optics: (a) A property possessed by many doubly refracting crystals of exhibiting different colors when viewed in different directions. Thus, palladium chlorid appears of a deep-red color along the axis, and of a vivid green when viewed in a transverse direction. Mica affords another example, being nearly opaque when viewed in one direction, but transparent and of a different color in another. This property is due to the difference in the absorption of the light-vibrations in the different directions. See polarochroism.

(b) The exhibition of essentially different colors by certain solutions in different degrees of dilution or concentration.

dichroistic (di-kro'-is-tik), a. [Gr. δίχροος + -istic.] Having the property of dichroism. Also dichroous.

dichroite (di-kro'-it), n. [Gr. δίχρως, two-colored (see dichroous), + -ite.] Lollite (which see): so called from its variation in color.

Dichromana (di-kro'-ma-nas'), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + χρῶμα, color, + νάσσα, Doric form of νάσσα, νάρρα, a duck: see Anas.] A genus of herons exhibiting dichromatism; the dichrois egret, as the reddish egret, D. rufa, which in one state is pure white (and known as Peale's egret), in another variously colored.

dichromate (di-kro'-māt), n. [Gr. δι-, two-, + χρῶμα (χρῶμα-), color, + -ate.] Same as bichromate.

dichromatic (di-kro'-mat'-ik), a. [Gr. δι-, two-, + χρῶμα (χρῶμα-), color: see chromatic. Cf. dichromic.] Having or producing two colors; exhibiting or characterized by dichromatism. Also dichroic and dichromatic.

dichromatism (di-kro'-ma-tizm), n. [Gr. δίχροος + -ism.] The quality of being dichromatic; the state or condition of normally presenting two different colors or systems of coloration: in zool., said of animals which, being ordinarily of a given color, regularly or frequently exhibit a different coloration, due to melanism, erythrisms, etc. The red and gray plumages of many owls, the red and green plumages of sundry parrots, the white and colored states of various herons, are examples of dichromatism. See color-variation.

Remarkable differences of plumage in many cases, constituting dichromatism, or permanent normal difference in color. Cosens, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 353.

dichromic (di-kro'-mik), a. [Gr. δίχρως, two-colored, < di-, two-, + χρῶμα, color: see chrome, etc.] Relating to or embracing two colors only; bichromatic: used by Herschel to describe the vision of a color-blind person who lacks the perception of one of the three primary colors assumed in accordance with the Young-Helmholtz theory of color (which see, under color).

Herschel regarded the vision of Dalton as dichromic, the red being wanting. Le Conte, Night, p. 63.

dichronous (di-kro'-nus), a. [L.L. dichronus, < Gr. δίχρονος, having two times or quantities, < di-, two-, + χρόνος, time.] In anc. pros.: (a) Having two times or quantities; varying in time; sometimes long and sometimes short; common; doubtful (Latin anceps): as, a dichronous vowel or syllable; representing a doubtful vowel-sound: as, a dichronous letter. In Greek grammar the three vowel-letters α, ι, υ, which may be either long or short in sound, are called dichronous, in contrast to the four remaining vowel-letters, which are fixed in quantity (ε and ο always short, η and ω always long). (b) Consisting of two normal short times or more; disemic: as, a dichronous foot; lasting for the space of two times or more: as, a dichronous long (that is, an ordinary long, equal to two shorts, distinguished from a trichronous or other protracted long): as, a dichronous pause. See disemic.

dichroous (di-kro'-us), a. [Gr. δίχρως, two-colored, < di-, two-, + χρῶμα, χρῶμα, color.] 1. Same as dichromatic.—2. Same as dichroistic.

dichroscope (di-kro'-skōp), n. [Irreg. < Gr. δίχρως, two-colored, + σκοπεω, view.] An instrument for testing the dichroism of crystals, usually consisting of an achromatized double-image prism of Iceland spar, fixed in a brass tube which has a small square hole at one end and a convex lens at the other, of such power as to give a sharp image of the square hole. On looking through the instrument the square hole appears double, the light which passes through being divided into two rays polarized in planes at right angles to each other; and if a dichroic crystal is placed in front of it, the two images, corresponding to the two sets of light-vibrations, will appear of different colors. A dichroscope may be combined with the polarizing apparatus of a microscope.

dichroscopic (di-kro'-skop'-ik), a. [Gr. δίχρως + -ic.] Pertaining to the dichroscope: as, dichroscopic observations.

dichtings, n. pl. See dichtings.

dicing (di'-sing), n. [ME. dycing, verbal n. of dycen, dycon, dice: see die, v.] 1. Gaming with dice.

Where dicing is, there are other follies also. Latimer, 6th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1546.

2. A method of decorating leather in squares or diamonds by pressure. E. H. Knight.

dicing-house (di'-sing'-hous), n. A house in which games with dice are played; a gaming-house.

The public pence cannot be kept where public dicing-houses are permitted. Jos. Taylor, Doctor Dubitantius, II. 672. (Latham.)

dikh (dik), n. [Var. of dike and of ditch.] The mound or bank of a ditch; a dike. Groen. [Prov. Eng.]

Dichotomy.
Inflorescence of Valeriana dentata.

dicke (dik), n. [Perhaps < D. dek, a cover, a horse-cloth (cf. deken, a coverlet, blanket, quilt), the same as dek, a deck: see dek, n., of which dicke is thus appar. a var. form. The E. form may be due in part to association with the proper name Dick. Hence dim. dickey, q. v.] 1. A leather apron.—2. A bib. Hall-well. [Prov. Eng. in both senses.]

dicke-duncock (dik'dun'ok), n. [From dicke (see dickey-bird) + duncock.] A local British name of the hedge-sparrow, Acoonor modularis. Macgillivray.

dickeens (dik'ens), n. [Prob. ult. connected with LG. dika, diker, deiker, the dense; all prob. fanciful variations of dence, LG. dus (see dence), the E. dickeens simulating Dickon, Dicoon, an old dim. nickname for Richard (see dickey), whence the surnames Dickens, Dickenson, Dicoonson, Dickenson, Dickinson, etc.] The dense: used interjectionally, with the definite article (formerly sometimes with the indefinite).

Ford. Where had you this pretty weathercock?
Mrs. Page. I cannot tell what the dickeens his name is my husband had him of. Shak., M. W. of W., III. 2.

What a dickeens does he mean by a trivial sum?
Comrade, Old Batchelor, II. 1.

To play the dickeens. Same as to play the deuce (which see, under deuce).

It is not a safe matter to undertake to disperse these robust monkeys who play the dickeens with the telegraph lines.
Electric Rev. (Amst.), XII. 6.

dickey (dik'er), n. [= So. daker, dakir, daiker, a quantity of ten (hides, etc.), < ME. dyker = Icel. dekr = Sw. decker = Dan. deger = LG. deker = G. decher, ten (hides, etc.) (ML. decure, decara, dicora, dacra, dacrum, OF. dakero, dacra, after the Teut. forms), < L. decuria, a division consisting of ten, < decem = E. ten: see decure and ten.] The number or quantity ten; particularly, ten hides or skins, forming the twentieth part of a last of hides. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Also that no manner foreyn sille no luther in the sold cite, but it be in the yelde halle of the same, paynges for the custom of every dyker, i. d.
English Glde (E. E. T. S.), p. 384.

dickey (dik'er), v. [Prob. < dickey], with reference to the frontier trade in hides, skins, etc.] I. intrans. To trade by petty bargaining and barter; haggle.

The white men who penetrated to the semi-wilds [of the West] were always ready to dickey and to swap.
Cooper, Oak Openings.

After years of dickeying, highly discreditable to a great State, Tennessee and her creditors agreed on sixty cents as the figure at which the State's obligations should be settled.
N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 138.

II. trans. To barter; trade off; swap. [Rare.] [U. S.]

dickey (dik'er), n. [From dickey, v.] Trading on a small scale by bargain and barter; a transaction so conducted. [U. S.]

Selish thrift and party hold the scales
For peddling dickey, not for honest sales.
Whittier, The Panorama.

dickey, n. See dickey.

dickeinsomite (dik'in-son-it), n. [After the Rev. William Dickinson.] A phosphate of manganese, calcium, and sodium, occurring in crystals and crystalline aggregates of a green color and micaceous structure at Branchville, Connecticut.

Dicksonia (dik-sō-ni-ā), n. [NL., after James Dickson, a British botanist (died 1822). The surname Dickson, otherwise spelled Dixon, is equiv. to Dick's son, Dick being a familiar form of Richard, and used both as a Christian name and as a surname. Cf. dickey.] A genus of ferns having large, much-divided fronds, and small sori placed close to the margin of the frond at the apex of a vein. The sori consist of an elevated globose receptacle bearing the sporidia, and inclosed by the cup-shaped indusium. The latter is open at the top, and partly adherent at the outer side to a reflexed toothlet of the frond. The number of species known is over 40, and about half of them are tree-ferns. An Australian species, Dicksonia antarctica, is one of the most ornamental tree-ferns in cultivation. Most of the species are confined to tropical America and Polynesia; but a few occur in the southern parts of the north temperate zone, and one, D. pilosiuscula, is common in eastern North America, and extends as far north as Canada.

Dicksonites (dik-sō-ni-ā'tēs), n. [NL., < Dicksonia + -ites.] The name of a genus of fossil ferns proposed by Stenzel, including species previously referred by authors to Pecopteris, Allopteris, and other genera, from which this genus has been separated in accordance with certain marked peculiarities in its fructification.

It occurs in the Lower Carboniferous in various localities in Europe.
dickey (dik'i), n.; pl. dickeys (-ies). [E. dial., also called dicke-ass; a familiar use of the proper name Dick, dim. Dicky; cf. jack-ass, of similar origin. The name Dick, otherwise Dick, is a familiar form of Richard, a favorite name in England since the time of Richard Coeur de Lion. The name is F., of OHG. origin: OHG. riht, riht, powerful, rich; hart, in comp. -hart, strong, brave: see rich and hard. Cf. dickens.] An ass; a donkey.

Time to begin the dickey races,
More famed for laughter than for speed.
Bloomfield, Richard and Kate.

dickey, dickey (dik'i), n.; pl. dickeys, dickeys (-ies). [Of dial. origin; dim. of dicke, q. v.] 1. A leather apron.—2. A child's bib.—3. A shirt-front; a separate front worn over the breast in place of a shirt, or to hide a shirt not fit to be seen. Separate shirt-fronts of this kind, also called false bosoms and shams, were worn over plain shirts for many years in the first half of the nineteenth century. 4. A kind of high standing shirt-collar formerly worn. [New Eng.]

My soul swells till it almost tears the shirt off my bussum, and even fractures my dickey.
J. C. Neal, Charcoal Sketches, III. 34.

5. The seat in a carriage on which the driver sits, whether in front or not; a seat behind the body of a carriage for servants, etc.

Three people were squeezed into it besides the driver, who sat, of course, in his own particular little dickey at the side.
Dickens, Pickwick, xlv.

dickey-bird (dik'i-bērd), n. [Also dickey-bird; < dickey, dim., applied familiarly to animals (see dickey), + bird.] A little bird.

'Twas, I know, in the spring-time when Nature looks gay,
As the poet observes, and on tree-top and spray
The dear little dickey-birds carol away.
Berham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 329.

Gladly would I throw up history to think of nothing but dickey-birds, but it must not be yet. Kingsley, Life, II. 41.

diclectum (di-klē'si-um), n.; pl. diclecta (-ā). [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + κλέω, a shutting up, closing, < κλείω, close: see close.] In bot., a dry fruit consisting of an achenium inclosed within the persistent hardened base of the perianth, as in the four-o'clock, Mirabilis jalapa.
diclinic, diclinatē (di-klīn'ik, di'kli-nāt), a. [From Gr. di-, two-, + κλίνω, incline (see clinic, incline), + -ic, -atē.] In crystal., having two of the intersections of the axes oblique: applied to a system so characterized. No crystals in nature are known which belong to this system, and it is in fact only a variety of the triclinic system, possessing no higher degree of symmetry. Also diclinous.
diclinism (di'kli-nizm), n. [From diclinous + -ism.] In bot., the state of being diclinous.

Diclinism may appear everywhere and is actually observed in many species, in which sexual cells are endowed with free motion, whether active or passive.
De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 231.

diclinous (di'kli-nus), a. [As diclinous + -ous.] In crystal., same as diclinic.
diclinous (di'kli-nus), a. [From Gr. di-, two-, + κλίνω, a bed, < κλίνω, recline. Cf. diclinic.] In bot., having only stamens or pistils: applied to unisexual flowers.

They [anemophilous plants] are often diclinous: that is, they are either monocious with their sexes separated on the same plant, or diclinous with their sexes on distinct plants.
Darwin, Cross and Self Fertilisation, p. 408.

dicococcus (di-kok'us), a. [From Gr. di-, two-, + κόκκος, a berry: see coccus.] In bot., formed of two cocci: applied to fruits having two separable lobes.

dicolous (di-sō'lus), a. [From Gr. di-, two-, + κόλος, hollow.] In anat.: (a) Cupped or hollowed at both ends, as a vertebra; amphicelous. P. Owen. (b) Having two cavities, in general; bilocular.

dicola, n. Plural of dicolon.
dicolic (di-kō'lik), a. [As dicolon + -ic.] 1. In pros., consisting of two cola or members: as, a dicolic line, verse, or period. In Greek and Roman poetry dicolic periods preponderate. The most frequent kinds of verse, the dactylic hexameter and the anapaestic and trochaic tetrameters (but not the ionic trimeter, which is monocolic), are examples. See cola.
The first two lines of each stanza resemble the two cola of a Greek dicolic line, or two musical phrases making up a longer strain.
Franc. Amer. Philol. Am., XVI. 85.

2. In rhet., consisting of two clauses or groups of clauses: as, a dicolic period.

dicolon (di-kō'lon), n.; pl. dicola (-lā). [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + κόλος, member.] In pros., a verse or period consisting of two cola or members. See dicolic.

dicondylia (di-kon-dil'i-an), a. [From Gr. δύο, double, double-knuckled, < di-, double-, + κνύδα, knuckle: see condyle.] Having two occipital condyles, as the skull of a mammal or an amphibian: opposed to monocondylia.

The Amphibia are the only air-breathing Vertebrates which, like mammals, have a dicondylia skull.
Encyc. Brit., XV. 370.

Dicoryne (di-kor'i-nē), n. [NL. (Allman, 1859), < Gr. di-, two-, + κόρυς, a club, a club-like bud or shoot.] A genus of gymnostele hydrozoans or tubularian hydroids, giving name to a family Dicorynidae. D. conferta is an example.

Dicorynidae (di-kō-rin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicoryne + -idae.] A family of Hydropolypinae, the generative zooids of which are free-swimming polyps with two tentacles and without a mouth, carrying two ova each. These zooids bud only on polypoides, and never on the alimentary zooids which have a verticil of filiform tentacles.

dicotyledon (di-kot-i-lē'don), n.; pl. dicotyledons (-dōnz) or dicotyledones (-dō-nēs). [From Gr. di-, two-, + κότυλη, a cavity: see cotyledon.] A plant which produces an embryo having two cotyledons. Dicotyledons form a natural class of the phanerogamous series of plants, characterized by the two opposite cotyledons, an exogenous mode of growth, and a netted venation of the leaves, and by seldom having a trimerous arrangement of the parts of the flower. From the structure of the stem, increasing by external growth, they are also known as euphorbia. The gymnosperms, in which the embryo has several cotyledons in a whorl, are usually included as a subclass, but by some recent botanists they are ranked as a distinct class. According to the more usual arrangement, the euphorbia dicotyledons are divided by the characters of the perianth into Polypetalae, Gamopetalae, and Apetalae or Monochlamydeae. These are subdivided into 164 orders. Several modifications of this system have been adopted, especially by continental European botanists, the most important of which is the distribution of the apetalous orders among the two other divisions. The total number of species of dicotyledonous plants now known is about 80,000, included under about 8,000 genera. See euphorbia.

dicotyledonous (di-kot-i-lē'dōn-us), a. [As dicotyledon + -ous.] In bot., having two cotyledons: as, a dicotyledonous embryo, seed, or plant.

Dicotyles (di-kot'i-lēs), n. [NL., so named by Cuvier in allusion to the curious glandular organ on the back, which was regarded by old travelers as a second navel; < Gr. δύο, two-, + κύτις, a hollow, hollow vessel, cup, cymbal, etc.: see cotyle. Sometimes ignorantly written Dyoctyles (intended for Dyscotyles), and said to be < Gr. δύο, ill, bad, in allusion to the bad smell of the gland.] The typical genus of the family Dicotylidae, or peccaries. D. torquatus, the leading species, is the collared peccary of Texas. The white-lipped peccary is D. labialis, sometimes referred to a different genus, Notophaea. See peccary.

Dicotylidae (di-kō-tīl'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicotyles + -idae.] A family of swine having a peculiar odoriferous dorsal gland, whence the name (see Dicotyles). It is the only family of dicotyliform swine, is confined to America, and consists of the peccaries. See peccary.

dicotyliform (di-kō-tīl'i-fōrm), a. Pertaining to the Dicotyliformia; having the characters of a peccary.

Dicotyliformia (di-kō-tīl'i-fōr'mi-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Dicotyles + L. forma, shape.] The Dicotylidae, or peccaries alone, as a superfamily group of swine, contrasted with the other swine collectively, the distinction resting chiefly upon detailed cranial characters. The canines are acute and trenchant, simply decurved, not twisted outward, as in the males of ordinary swine, and the condyles of the lower jaw are simply transverse.

Dicranobranchia (di-kra-nō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. διπύρρον, two-headed (see Dicranum), + βράγχια, gills.] A suborder of rhypidoglossate gastropods. The gills are in two symmetrical dorsal plumes (whence the name); the body and shell are not spiral: the foot is slightly bearded; the eyes are sessile; and the median teeth of the odontophore are of two kinds, the inner being small and similar, and the outer large and dissimilar. The group was named by J. E. Gray for the family Pleurodidae, or keyhole-limpets.

Dicranoceros (di-kra-nōs'e-rōs), n. [NL., < Gr. διπύρρον, two-headed, + κέρας, horn.] Same as Antilocapra. Hamilton Smith, 1827.

dicranoid (di-kra'nōid), a. [From Dicranum + -oid.] Resembling plants of the genus Dicranum; bifid, as in Dicranum: said of the teeth of the peristome of mosses.

dicranterian (di-kran-tē'ri-an), a. Same as dicranterian.

Dicranum (di-kra-num), n. [NL., < Gr. διπύρρον, two-headed, < di-, two-, + πύρρον, the skull.] A large genus of mosses, comprising many species. The plants are large, and have spreading or second a, plant, natural size; b, four-toothed peristome, highly magnified.

Dieracium repens.

leaves with a strong costa. In this, as in allied genera, the teeth of the peristome are bifid to the middle (dicranoid).

dicrotal (di-kro'tal), a. Same as dicrotic.

dicrotic (di-kro'tik), a. [Gr. dikroto, double-beating, < di-, two-, double, + spiro, a rattling noise, beat, dash.] 1. Double-beating: applied to the pulse when for one heart-beat there are two arterial pulses as felt by the finger or shown by the sphygmograph.—2. Pertaining to a dicrotic pulse.—Dicrotic notch, the notch in a sphygmogram preceding the dicrotic crest. See sphygmogram.—Dicrotic wave or crest. (a) The second of the two large waves of a dicrotic pulse as traced in a sphygmogram. (b) The smaller corresponding crest or wave in pulses not dicrotic.

dicrotism (dik-rō'tizm), n. [< dicrotic + -ism.] The state of being dicrotic.

This dicrotism, however, characterizes particularly aortic and typhoid types of fever. Med. News, LIII, 401.

dicrotous (dik-rō'tus), a. [Gr. dikroto, double-beating: see dicrotic.] Dicrotic.

Dicruridae (di-kro'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicurus + -idae.] A large family of denterostrial oscine passerine birds of Asia, the East Indies, etc., and also of Africa; the drongos or drongoshrikes. They have comparatively slender bodies, a long forked tail, long rounded wings, a stout hooked bill with rictal vibrissae, small but stout feet, and mostly black or dark plumage and red eyes. The Dicruridae are not shrikes in the proper sense of that term, but rather crow-like birds of insectivorous nature and somewhat the habits of flycatchers. There are upward of 50 species. The leading genera are: Dicurus, of which Edolius is a synonym, chiefly Indian and East Indian, but with one African group of species; Diamurus, in which the length of the tail is at a maximum; Bhiringa, Chibia, Chaptalia, and Melanornis, the last African. The genus Irena is sometimes brought under this family. The term Dicruridae is sometimes extended to the swallow-shrikes, Artamus, Edolius or Edoliana is a synonym. See cut under drongo.

Dicrurus (di-kro'ri-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicurus + -us.] The drongos as the typical subfamily of the Dicruridae, and containing all the family excepting Irenina, or as a subfamily of some other family.

Dicurus (di-kro'rus), n. [NL., lit. fork-tailed, < Gr. dikro, shorter form of dikroto, contr. of dikroto, forked (equiv. to dikroto, forked, cloven, lit. two-horned, contr. of dikroto, two-horned, < di-, two-, + kapala, a horn, point, < akpa, a horn; cf. diceros), + ur, tail.] The typical and largest genus of Dicruridae; the drongos proper. The king or king-crow of Bengal, D. macrocercus, is a typical example. The genus is often called Bhuchanga or Buchanga. Edolius also is a synonym, but sometimes used for a section of the genus represented by the Madagascari E. forficatus. Another section of the genus contains the singing drongos of Africa, as D. muscivorus. A section with the tail most deeply forked is Diamurus, containing such as the Indian bee-king, D. paradiseus. See drongo.

dict (dikt), n. [ME. dicte; < L. dictum, a thing said: see dictum.] A saying; a dictum. [Archaic.]

What the old dict was true after all?

C. Reade, Cloister and Hearth, xxxvi.

dicta, n. Plural of dictum.

dictament (dik-tā'men), n. [< LL. ML. dictamen, < L. dictare, prescribe, dictate: see dictate.] A dictate; a precept; an injunction.

I must tell you (not out of mine own dictamen, but the author's) a good play is like a skin of all; which, if you take by the right end, you may wind off at pleasure.

B. Jonson, Magnetic Lady, Ind.

dictamentum (dik-tā'men-tum), n. [< ML. "dictamentum", < L. dictare, dictate. See dictate. Cf. dictamen.] A dictate.

If any followed, in the whole tenor of their lives, the dictaments of right reason.

Sir K. Digby, On Browne's Religio Medici.

Dictamnus (dik-tam'num), n. Same as Dictamnus, 2.

dictamnus (dik-tam'num), n. [L., also dictamnus, < Gr. dictamnōn, dictamnōn, also dictamnōn, dittany, a plant which grew on Mounts Dicta and Ida in Crete; hence ult. E. dittany, q. v.] 1. A plant of the genus Dictamnus.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of rutaceous plants, of a single species, D. albus, the fraxinella or dittany, a native of southern Europe and central Asia. It is an old inhabitant of country gardens, cultivated for its showy flowers, which are of various colors, and for its fragrance. The whole plant is covered with glands which secrete an oil so volatile that in hot weather the air about the plant becomes inflammable.

dictamnus (dik-tā'num), n. Dictamnus; dittany.

The Hart, being perched with the dart, runneth out of hand to the heart Dictamnus, and is healed.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 61.

dictate (dik-tāt), v.; pret. and pp. dictated, ppr. dictating. [< L. dictatus, pp. of dictare (> L. dictare, dictare = Sp. Pg. Fr. dictar = F. dicter, > D. dicteren = G. dictiren = Dan. diktere = Sw. diktera), say often, pronounce, declare, dictate (to another for writing), prescribe, order; freq. of dicere, pp. dictus, say: see diction.] 1. trans. 1. To declare or prescribe with authority; direct or command positively, as being right, necessary, or inevitable: as, conscience dictates truthfulness and fair dealing; to dictate a course of conduct, or terms of surrender.

I hope God hath given me ability to be master of my own passion, and endowed me with that reason that will dictate unto me what is for my own good and benefit.

State Trials, Lt.-Col. Lilburne, an. 1649.

The conduct of life (in Russia) was dictated to the citizens at large in the same way as to soldiers.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 558.

2. To be the determining cause or motive of; fix or decide positively or unavoidably: as, necessity dictated the abandonment of the ship; his conduct is dictated by false pride.

I find his present prosecution was dictated by tyranny, cowardice, and revenge.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xxxi.

3. To express orally for another to write down; give utterance or form to, as something to be written: as, to dictate a letter to a clerk.

The mind which dictated the Illad. Wayland.

=Syn. 1. To command, prescribe, enjoin, require.

II. intrans. To practice dictation; act or speak dictatorially; exercise controlling or arbitrary authority; assume a dictatorial, dogmatic, or commanding attitude.

A woman dictates before marriage in order that she may have an appetite for sublimation afterward.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, i. 80.

From the compulsory austerities and cropped hair of the Puritan men rushed or sneaked, as their temperaments dictated, to the opposite cult of sensuality and a wildness of periwig.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 393.

dictate (dik-tāt), n. [= D. dictat = G. dictat = Dan. diktat, a dictate, = OF. dicta, dicta, m., a dictation, F. dicte, f., dictation (see dicty), = Sp. Pg. dictado = It. dictato, dictato, < L. dictatum, usually in pl. dictata, what is dictated, neut. pp. of dictare: see dictate, v. Cf. dict, in dict, adit, ult. < L. dictare.] 1. A positive order or command; an authoritative or controlling direction.

Those right helps of art which will scarce be found by those who scrupulously confine themselves to the dictates of others.

Locke.

Resides his duties at Westminster, he must attend to his constituents, must show himself among them from time to time, and must be ever ready to listen to complaints, suggestions, or even dictates.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX, 206.

2. An authoritative rule, maxim, or precept; a guiding principle: as, the dictates of conscience or of reason.

The Laws of well-doing are the dictates of right Reason.

Hooker, Eccl. Polity, i. 7.

I credit what the Grecian dictates may.

Prior.

This is an obvious dictate of our common sense.

H. James, Suhs. and Shad., p. 97.

It was, or it seemed, the dictate of trade to keep the negro down.

Emerson, West Indian Emancipation.

3. Dictation. [Rare.]

Many bishops . . . might be at Philippi, and many were actually there, long after St. Paul's dictate of the epistle.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1885), II, 128.

4. That which is dictated; a dictated utterance.

The public prayers of the people of God, in churches thoroughly settled, did never use to be voluntary dictates proceeding from any man's extemporal wit.

Hooker, Eccl. Polity, v. 25.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Injunction, admonition.

dictation (dik-tā'shun), n. [< LL. dictatio(n), < L. dictare, pp. dictatus, dictate: see dictate.] 1. The act or practice of dictating, directing, or prescribing: as, he wrote the passage at the teacher's dictation.

What heretics and prodigious opinions have been set on foot . . . under the pretence of the dictation and warrant of God's Spirit! Sp. Hall, Remains, p. 148.

2. Authoritative command or control; positive or arbitrary prescription, direction, or order: as, his dictation brought affairs into great confusion.

If either of these two powers [France and Spain] had disarmed, it would soon have been compelled to submit to the dictation of the other.

Mackay.

=Syn. Injunction, prescription, direction.

dictator (dik-tā'tor), n. [= F. dictateur = Sp. Pg. dictador = It. dittatore, dictatore = D. G. dictador = Dan. Sw. diktator = Gr. dictator, < L. dictator, a commander, dictator, < dictare, pp. dictatus, command, dictate: see dictate.] 1. A person possessing unlimited powers of government; an absolute ruler. In ancient Rome dictators were appointed in times of exigency and distress for a term of six months; and there were also dictators with powers limited to specific acts. In later times usurpers have often made themselves dictators, and dictatorial powers have been expressly conferred. The rulers of Paraguay bore the title of dictator for many years, and those of several other Spanish-American countries have done so for longer or shorter periods.

Government must not be a parish clerk, a justice of the peace. It has, of necessity, in any crisis of the state, the absolute powers of a Dictator.

Emerson, Amer. Civilization.

All classes have had to submit to that sort of authority which assumed its most innocent shape in the office of the Roman Dictator, its most odious in the usurpation of the Greek Tyrant.

Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 84.

2. A person invested with or exercising absolute authority of any kind; one who assumes to control or prescribe the actions of others; one who dictates.

Unanimous, they all commit the care

And management of this main enterprise

To him, their great dictator. Milton, P. R., l. 113.

The great dictator of fashions.

Pope.

dictatorial (dik-tā'tō'ri-əl), a. [= F. dictatorial; as dictatory + -al.] 1. Pertaining to a dictator; absolute; unlimited.

Military powers quite dictatorial.

Irving.

2. Pertaining to or characteristic of dictation; imperious; overbearing; dogmatic.

The disagreeable effect that accompanies a tone inclined to be dictatorial.

Dierail, Coinings, iv. 4.

I have just read yours of the 19th inst. If there be perceptible in it an impatient and dictatorial tone, I waive it in deference to an old friend whose heart I have always supposed to be right.

Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 210.

=Syn. Authoritative, dogmatic, etc. See magisterial.

dictatorially (dik-tā'tō'ri-əl-i), adv. In a dictatorial or commanding manner; dogmatically.

These are strong statements; they are made dictatorial, because want of space forbids anything but assertion.

N. A. Rev., CXXVI, 478.

dictatorialness (dik-tā'tō'ri-əl-nes), n. The quality or state of being dictatorial.

A spirit of arrogance and contemptuous dictatorialness.

George Eliot, in Cross, III, 212.

dictatorian (dik-tā'tō'ri-an), a. [< dictatory + -an.] Dictatorial.

A dictatorian power, more accommodate to the first production of things. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 247.

dictatorship (dik-tā'tō'ri-ship), n. [< Dictator + -ship.] 1. The office or dignity of a dictator; the term of a dictator's office.

This is the solemnest title they can confer under the principedom, being indeed a kind of Dictatorship.

Sir H. Wotton.

2. Absolute authority; dogmatism.

This is that perpetual dictatorship which is exercised by Lucretius, though often in the wrong.

Dryden.

dictatory (dik-tā'tō'ri), a. [= Sp. Pg. dictatorio, < L. dictatorius, of or belonging to a dictator, < dictator, a dictator: see dictator.] Dictatorial.

Our English, the language of men ever famous and foremost in the achievements of liberty, will not easily and servilely letters enow to spell such a dictatory presumption Englished.

Milton, Areopagitica.

dictatress (dik-tā'tres), n. [< Dictator + -ess.] A female dictator; a woman who commands arbitrarily and irresponsibly.

dictatrix (dik-tā'triks), n. [L., fem. of dictator: see dictator.] Same as dictatress.

dictature (dik-tā'tūr), n. [= F. dictature = Sp. Pg. dictadura = It. dittatura, dictatura = D. G. dictatur = G. dictatur = Dan. Sw. diktatur, < L. dictatura, < dictare, pp. dictatus, dictate: see dictator, dictate.] Dictatorship.

Some speak what a strange resolution it was in Lucius Sulla to resign his dictatorship.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 92.

dictory (dik'to-ri), n. [= Sp. Pg. dictorio, < L. dictorium, a witty saying, in form as if < Gr. deutropos, a place for showing, eccles. a sort of pulpit (< deutros, verbal adj. of deusivus, show), but in sense < L. dicere, pp. dictus, say: see diction.] A witty saying; a jest; a scold.

I did heap up all the dictories I could against women, but now recant.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 554.

diction (dik'shon), n. [= F. diction, OF. diction, dictio = Sp. diccion = Pg. dicção = It. diczione = D. dictie = G. diction = Dan. Sw. diktion, < L. dictio (n.), a saying, expression, kind of delivery, style, use of a word, L.L. also a word (whence M.L. dictionarium, a dictionary), < dicere, pp. dictus, say, tell, declare, name, appoint, related to dicere, declare, proclaim, publish, = Gr. deu-vivus, show, point out, = Skt. √ dig, show, point out, = Goth. ga-telhan, tell, announce, = OHG. sihan, MHG. sihan, G. sehen, accuse (whence OHG. seigon, MHG. G. seigen, point out), = AS. teon (orig. **than*), accuse. From the same Teut. root come AS. tecan, point out, E. touch, and AS. tecan, E. token, q. v. The L. dicere and dicere are the ult. sources of a great many E. words: namely, from L. dicere, E. dict, dictate, dictum, dicto, etc., diction, dictionary, condition, addict, contradict, interdict, predict, addiction, contradiction, indiction, prediction, etc., benediction = benison, malediction = malison, validation, etc.; from the freq. dictare, E. dictate, dicty, dicty, dicty, dicty, etc.; from dicere, E. advocate, dedicate, indicate, predicate, preach, predicament, etc., index, judge, judicate, adjudicate, etc.; from the Gr. deu-vivus, E. dictio, apodictic, apodictic, etc.] 1. Expression of ideas by words; manner of saying; choice or selection of words; style.

It is the imperishable diction, the language of Shakespeare before Shakespeare wrote, which diffuses its enchantment over the "Arcadia."

I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 106.

His command of language was immense. With him died the secret of the old poetical diction of England—the art of producing rich effects by familiar words.

Macaulay, Dryden.

Nothing but the charm of narrative had saved Ariosto, as Tasso had been saved by his diction, and Milton by his style.

Lowell, Fielding.

2. A word.

In dictions are first to be considered their etymology and conjugation.

Burgerdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

= Syn. Dictio, Phrasology, Style. Dictio refers chiefly to the choice of words in any utterance or composition. Phrasology refers more to the manner of combining the words into phrases, clauses, and sentences: as, legal phrasology; but it also necessarily involves dictio to some extent. Style covers both and more, referring not only to the words and the manner in which they are combined, but to everything that relates to the form in which thought is expressed, including peculiarities more or less personal to the writer or speaker.

The book of Job, indeed, in conduct and diction, bears a considerable resemblance to some of his [Milton's] dramas.

Macaulay, Milton.

The Book of Sophisms [in Aristotle's "Organon"] . . . still supplies a very convenient phrasology for marking concisely some of the principal fallacies which are apt to impose on the understanding in the heat of a viva voce dispute.

D. Stewart, The Human Mind, II. 31. § 3.

The genius of the great poet seeks repose in the expression of itself, and finds it at last in style, which is the establishment of a perfect mutual understanding between the worker and his material.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 181.

Dictat, Idiom, etc. See language.

dictionary (dik-sho-nē-ri-an), n. [dictionary + -an.] The compiler of a dictionary; a lexicographer. Dawson. [Rare.]

dictyonary (dik'shon-ā-ri), n. and a. [= F. dictionnaire (> G. dictionär = Sw. diktionär = Dan. diktionær) = Sp. Pg. diccionario = It. diccionario, < M.L. dictionarium, neut., also dictionarius, m. (ec. L. liber, book), lit. a word-book, < L.L. dictio (n.), a word; see diction. First used, it is said, by Joannes de Garlandia (died about A. D. 1250), the compiler of a dictionarius, a classified list of words. Exactly equiv. in etymological meaning are vocabulary, lexicon, and word-book.] 1. n.; pl. dictyonaries (-ries). A book containing either all or the principal words of a language, or words of one or more specified classes, arranged in a stated order, usually alphabetical, with definitions or explanations of their meanings and other information concerning them, expressed either in the same or in another language; a word-book; a lexicon; a vocabulary; as, an English dictyonary; a Greek and Latin dictyonary; a French-English or an English-French dictyonary. In the original and most usual sense a dictionary is chiefly linguistic and literary, containing all the common words of the language with information as to their meanings and uses. In addition to definitions, the larger dictionaries include etymologies, pronunciation, and variations of spelling, together with illustrative citations, more or less explanatory information, etc. Special or technical dictionaries supply information on a single subject or branch of a subject: as, a dictyonary of medicine or of mechanics; a biographical dictyonary. A dictionary of geography is usually called a gazetteer.

What speech esteem you most? The king's, said I. But the best words? O, Sir, the dictionary.

Pope, Donne Verified, iv.

The multiplication and improvement of dictionaries is a matter especially important to the general comprehension of English. G. F. Marsh, Lect. on Eng. Lang., xxi. = Syn. Glossary, Lexicon, etc. See vocabulary.

II. a. Pertaining to or contained in a dictionary.

The word having acquired in common usage a vituperative connotation in addition to its dictionary meaning.

J. S. Mill, Logic, v. 7.

dictum (dik'tum), n.; pl. dicta (-tā). [= F. dictum = Sw. dictum, < L. dictum, something said, a word, a witty saying, a proverb, an order, neut. of dictus, pp. of dicere, say: see diction. In older E. form dict, q. v.] 1. A positive or judicial assertion; an authoritative saying.

Critical dicta everywhere current. M. Arnold.

In spite of Dr. Johnson's dictum, poetry is not prose, and . . . verse only loses its advantage over the latter by invading its province.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 180.

The authoritative Native treatises on law are so vague that, from many of the dicta embodied by them, almost any conclusion can be drawn.

Maine, Village Communities, App., p. 303.

There is no error in maintaining that the voice is given us for speech, if only we do not proceed to draw from such a dictum false conclusions as to the relation between thought and utterance.

Whitney, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 767.

2. In law, an opinion of a judge which does not embody the resolution or determination of the court, and is made without argument, or full consideration of the point, and is not the professed deliberate determination of the judge himself. Chief-Justice Folger.—3. In logic, that part of a modal proposition which consists of the proposition to which the modality is applied.

It is necessary that God be good. The dictum is that God be good, the mode, necessary.

Burgerdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

Dictum de omni et de nullo (concerning every and none), the rule of direct syllogism that if all A is B and all B is C, then all A is C. Some logicians render this as comprising two dicta: the dictum de omni, that whatever is true of all is true of each, and the dictum de nullo, that whatever is true of none is false of each. The canon is given by Aristotle.—Dictum of Kenilworth, an award designed for the pacification of the kingdom, made between King Henry III. of England and Parliament in 1260, during the siege of Kenilworth. It is published among the statutes of the realm, I. 12.—Dictum simpliciter. See simpliciter.—Obiter dicta, legal dicta (def. 3) uttered by the way (obiter), not upon the point or question pending, as if turning aside for the time from the main topic of the case to collateral subjects.—Syn. 1. Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, etc. See aphorism.

Dictyocysta (dik'ti-ō-sis'tā), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + cystis, bladder.] The typical genus of Dictyocystidae, containing pelagic free-swimming animalcules with a fenestrated silicious lorica and tentaculiform cilia. D. cassii and D. elegans are examples. Ehrenberg.

Dictyocystidae (dik'ti-ō-sis'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dictyocysta + -idae.] A group of free marine peritrichous infusorians, having a bell-shaped body protected by a cancellated silicious test, and a circular oval collar with many long flagelliform cilia. Also Dictyocystida. Haeckel, 1873.

dictyogen (dik'ti-ō-jen), n. [Gr. dikruon, a net, + -γεν, producing: see -gen.] A member of a division of plants proposed by Lindley to include such endogenous genera as have net-veined leaves. They belong chiefly to the Diocoriales and to some tribes of the Liliaceae. dictyogenous (dik'ti-ō-jen'-e-nus), a. [dictyogen + -ous.] In bot., having the character of a dictyogen; having the general character of an endogen, but with netted leaf-veins.

Dictyograptus (dik'ti-ō-grap'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + NL. Graptus.] A genus of widely distributed and important fossils, originally described by Richwald under the name of Gorgonia flabelliformis, and later by Hall under that of Dictyonema, and by him at that time (1852) considered to be corals, having a structure similar to that of Fenestella. Later the name Dictyograptus was substituted for Dictyonema. This fossil has been considered by some as a plant, but is now referred to the graptolites, from which it differs but slightly, if at all. Dictyograptus is "one of the most charac-

dictyonial (dik'ti-ō-nal), a. [As dictyon-ion + -al.] Same as dictyonine.

Dictyonema (dik'ti-ō-nē-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + nēma, a thread.] See Dictyography.

Dictyonina (dik'ti-ō-ni-nā), n. pl. [NL. (Zittel), < Gr. dikruon, a net, + -ina.] A suborder of hexactinellid silicious sponges, whose parenchymal hexacts unite in a regular firm skeleton: contrasted with Lyssacina. The families Parvireida, Eurireida, Mellitireida, Coscinoporida, Tretodictyidae, and Neandrospongiidae compose the suborder.

dictyonine (dik'ti-ō-nin), a. Of or pertaining to the Dictyonina. Also dictyonial.

Dictyophora (dik-ti-ō-fō-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + -phora, < φέρω = E. bear.] The typical genus of Dictyophorida. Germar, 1833.

Dictyophorida (dik'ti-ō-fō-rī-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Dictyophora + -ida.] A subfamily of Fulgoroidea, or other group of hemipterous insects, typified by the genus Dictyophora. As a subfamily the regular form would be Dictyophorinae. Also Dictyophoridae.

Dictyophyllum (dik'ti-ō-fī-lum), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, net, + φύλλον = L. folium, leaf.] A genus of fossil ferns established by Lindley and Hutton, remarkable for its double system of nervation, consisting of a system of larger meshes inclosing another system of smaller ones, the whole bearing considerable resemblance to leaves of dictyolethonous plants. Hence some fossil leaves really belonging to the dictyolethons have, probably by mistake, been referred to this genus. Some authors are at present inclined to regard Dictyophyllum as a convenient name under which to place the description of fragments of doubtful character considered as belonging to the ferns. See Dictyophyllum and Phyllites.

Dictyophyton (dik-ti-ō-fī-ton), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + φύτον, a plant.] The name given by Hall to a genus of remarkable fossils of obscure affinities, which have been compared with algae of the family Dictyotaceae. It is also considered as being closely related to, or identical with, the genus Ephenantia of Vanuxem. The latter genus exhibits itself in the form of circular or subcircular fronds, made up of ligulate, radiating, and concentric bands or striae, which have the appearance of being interwoven like a network. With these flabellate forms are associated others which are conical or cylindrical, marked externally by cross striae which divide the surface into rectangular spaces, and sometimes covered with long tubercles arranged in vertical and transverse rows. These latter forms are those which Hall included under the generic name of Dictyophyton. They are found in the Chenung group (Devonian) in New York, and in the Waverly group (Lower Carboniferous) of Ohio.

Dictyoptera (dik-ti-ōp'tē-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + πτερόν, a wing.] A group of cursorial orthopterous insects, the cockroaches, Blattaria or Blattina, elevated to the rank of an order. Leach; Burmeister.

Dictyopteris (dik-ti-ōp'tē-ri-s), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + πτερίς, a fern.] The name given by Gutbier to a genus of fossil ferns closely resembling Neuropteris, but differing from that genus by its reticulate nervation. It is abundant in the coal-measures of Europe and the United States.

Dictyopyge (dik'ti-ō-pi-jē), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + πύγξ, buttocks.] A genus of Triassic ganoid fishes, remains of which occur in the coal-fields of Virginia: so called from the reticulated appearance of the large anal fin. Leal, 1847.

Dictyotaceae (dik'ti-ō-tā'-sē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, netted, latticed (< dikruon, a net), + -aceae.] An order of olive-brown algae with expanded membranous fronds. In their reproductive characters they are intermediate between the Florideae on the one hand and the Fucales and Phaeoeraceae on the other.

Dictyotema (dik-ti-ō-tē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, netted, latticed, + -tema.] See Dictyotaceae. Same as Dictyotaceae.

dictyoxylon (dik-ti-ōk'si-lon), n. [NL., < Gr. dikruon, a net, + ξύλον, wood.] The name given by Brongniart to a variety of fossil wood occurring in the coal-measures of Europe, and considered to be closely allied to Sigillaria.

Leaf of Dictyopteris Brongniarti, and portion of a stem, from a lower scale. (From Weiser's "Flora der Steinholzkformation.")

The leaf-scars of dietyxylon are subpentagonal in form, broader than they are long, and have a slight groove at the upper end.

dicyan, dicyanogen (di-si'an, di-si-an'-jō-jen), n. [< di- + cyan(ogen).] See cyanogen.

Dicyma (dis-i-ē'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two- + kyma, an embryo, a fetus, < kyeiv, be pregnant.] A remarkable genus of ciliated filiform parasites found in the renal organs of cephalopods. The body consists of an elongated axial cell extending from one end to the other, invested in a single layer of comparatively small, flattened, nucleated, and ciliated cortical cells arranged like a pavement epithelium around the axial cell, the anterior of these, or polar cells, being distinguished from the succeeding or paralar cells. The organism is a simple cell-aggregate, without connective, muscular, or nervous tissue. Reproduction takes place by the formation of germs on the axial cell. The embryos are of two different kinds, vermiform and infusiform, whence the name. Those Dicymida which give rise to the former kind are termed Nematogena, the others Rhombogena.

Dicyma sp., highly magnified.

I. Adult, showing large papillae of the cortical layer and germs in interior of axial cell. II. Vermiform embryo in different stages of development. III. Infusiform embryo: a, the urn; ca, its capsule; s, its lid; i, multinucleate cells in its interior.

Hum around the axial cell, the anterior of these, or polar cells, being distinguished from the succeeding or paralar cells. The organism is a simple cell-aggregate, without connective, muscular, or nervous tissue. Reproduction takes place by the formation of germs on the axial cell. The embryos are of two different kinds, vermiform and infusiform, whence the name. Those Dicymida which give rise to the former kind are termed Nematogena, the others Rhombogena.

Dicymida (dis-i-em'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicyma + -ida.] A division of animals proposed to be established by E. Van Beneden for the genus Dicyma, which has no mesoblastic layer, and is therefore regarded as intermediate between the Protozoa and the Metazoa.

Dicymidæ (dis-i-em'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicyma + -idæ.] Same as Dicymida.

Dicynodon (di-sin'-ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two- + kyon (kyōn), dog (= E. hound), + donos (dōnos) = E. tooth.] The typical genus of Dicynodontidae. Remains of species have been found in southern Africa, in the Ural mountains, and in India, in strata supposed to be of Triassic age.

Skull of Dicynodon lacerticeps, left side.

dicynodont (di-sin'-ō-dont), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Dicynodontia: as, a dicynodont dentition; a dicynodont reptile.

II. n. A member of the Dicynodontia. Only the crocodiles now show a like extent of ossification of the occiput, and only the chelonians the trenchant toothless mandible. . . . In mammals alone do we find a development of tusks like that in the dicynodonts.

Owen, Anat., I. 161.

Dicynodontia (di-sin-ō-don'ō-shi-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of dicynodon (-t): see Dicynodon.] I. An order of extinct reptiles, probably of the Triassic period, remains of which have been found in Asia and Africa: a synonym of Anomodontia. There are two genera, Dicynodon and Oudenodon, including lacertiform animals, sometimes of large size, with crocillian vertebrae, four or five of which form a sacrum; with a massive skull, lacertilian in most of its characters, but with chelonian jaws, which were doubtless incased in a horny beak; and as a rule with two great tusks, one on each side of the upper jaw, deeply socketed in the maxilla, and growing from persistent pulpa.

2. A family or subordinal group of Anomodontia: same as Dicynodontidae.

dicynodontian (di-sin-ō-don'ti-an), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Dicynodontia.

The supposition that the Dinosaurian, Crocodilian, Dicynodontian, and Plesiosaurian types were suddenly created at the end of the Permian epoch may be dismissed, without further consideration, as a monstrous and unwarranted assumption.

Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 213.

II. n. One of the Dicynodontia.

dicynodontid (di-sin-ō-don'tid), n. A member of the Dicynodontidae.

Dicynodontidae (di-sin-ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicynodon (-t) + -idæ.] A family of fossil reptiles, typified by the genus Dicynodon.

Dicystida (di-sis'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dicystis (< Gr. di-, two- + kystis, bladder, mod. 'cyst'), the typical genus, + -ida.] Same as Gregarinidae.

Dicystidae (di-sis-tid'ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Dicystis (see Dicystidae) + -idæ.] A division of the Gregarinida containing those in which the body is composed of two cysts: contrasted with Monocystidae.

did (did). Preterit of do, do.

didactic (di-dak'tik), a. and n. [= F. didactique = Sp. didactico = Pg. didactico (cf. D. didaktisch, a., didaktiek, n., = G. didaktisch, a., didaktik, n., = Dan. Sw. didaktisk, a.), < Gr. didaktikos, apt at teaching, < didaktos, verbal adj. of didaskō, teach (for **di-dak-askō*), = L. docere, teach (see docile, cf. disco-ere, learn (see disciple); cf. Gr. aor. inf. didaskō, learn, redupl. 2d aor. didōn, he taught, perf. didōnka, also didōn, I know; cf. Zend did, know.] I. a. 1. Fitted or intended for instruction; containing doctrines, precepts, principles, or rules; instructive; expository; edifying: as, a didactic treatise; didactic poetry.

Plato himself, in two of his Dialogues, had used the Carthaginian voyages as materials for didactic fiction. C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 81.

2. Pertaining to instruction; of an edifying quality, character, or manner; used in or given to exposition: as, a didactic style; didactic methods; a didactic lecturer.

Deep obligations lie upon you, . . . not only to be blameless, but to be didactic in your lives. Jer. Taylor, Works, III. x.

We . . . shall have our lightest pleasures commented upon by didactic dullness. Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 1.

II. n. A treatise on education. Milton.

didactic (di-dak'ti-kal), a. [< didactic + -al.] Same as didactic. [Rare.]

We shall not need here to describe, out of their didactic writings, what kind of prayers, and what causes of confidence they teach towards the Blessed Virgin Mary and all the Saints. Jer. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, I. II. § 9.

didactically (di-dak'ti-kal-ē), adv. In a didactic manner; in the form of instruction.

Points best resolved by the books of the Fathers, written dogmatically or didactically. Ep. Andrews, Ans. to Cardinal Perron, p. 60.

didactician (di-dak'ti-shan), n. [< didactic + -ian.] One who teaches; a writer who aims to convey instruction; one who writes didactically.

His essays are illuminated by his poetic imagination, and he thus becomes a better prose-writer than a mere didactician ever could be. Steadman, Viet. Poets, p. 100.

didacticism (di-dak'ti-sizm), n. [< didactic + -ism.] The practice of conveying or of aiming to convey instruction; the tendency to be didactic in matter or style.

That contemplative method which rose to imagination in the high discourse of Wordsworth . . . too often sinks to didacticism in the perplexed and timorous strains of his didactics. Steadman, Viet. Poets, p. 413.

didacticity (di-dak'ti-si-ti), n. [< didactic + -ity.] The quality of being didactic; didacticism. [Rare.]

didactics (di-dak'tiks), n. [Pl. of didactic: see -ics.] The art or science of teaching; pedagogics.

didactic (di-dak'tiv), a. [< didact-ic + -ive.] Didactic. [Rare.]

He is under the restraint of a formal or didactic hypocrisy. Lamb, Old and New Schoolmaster.

didactyl, didactyle (di-dak'til), a. and n. [< Gr. didaktulos, two fingers long or broad, lit. having two fingers, < di-, two- + daktylos, finger: see dactyl.] I. a. Having only two digits, as fingers or toes; two-fingered or two-toed: in the arthropods, applied to limbs which terminate in a forepaw or chela. Also didactyl.

II. n. An animal having two toes only on each foot, as the Bradypus didactylus or two-toed sloth.

didactylous (di-dak'ti-lus), a. [As didactyl + -ous.] Same as didactyl.

didapper (did'ap-er), n. [Also didapper, di-dapper] (also in restored forms diedapper, die-dapper), *< ME. *didapper, dydapper*, the same, with suffix of agent -er, as the older **dydoppe, dyedoppe, dyedapp*, used by Wyelf (as dipere, i. e., dipper, by Purvey) to translate L. mergulus in Deut. xiv. 17 and Lev. xl. 17 (where the A. V., and also the R. V., has "pelican" and "cormorant"); < AS. dyfedoppa, a general term for a diving bird used to translate L. pelicanus, pelican), < dājan, dive, + doppetan, dip, dip: see dive, dop, dopper, dip, dipper, dabchick.] 1. The dabchick or little grebe of Europe, Podiceps or Sylbeceolus minor.—2. One of sundry other small grebes, as the pied-billed dabchick, Podilymbus podiceps.

didascalle (di-das'kal'ik), a. [= Sp. didascalleo = Pg. It. didascalleo, < Gr. didaskalios, < did- or for teaching, < didaskō, a teacher, < did-askō, teach: see didactic.] Didactic; preceptive; conveying instruction. [Rare.]

Under what species it may be comprehended, whether didascalle or heroic, I leave to the judgment of the critics. Prior, Solomon, Crit.

Didascalle syllogism, a demonstrative syllogism.

didder (did'er), v. t. [E. dial., also dither, < ME. dyderen, also dederen, shiver, tremble with cold or fear. Another form with the same sense is E. dial. dodder, shiver, tremble, shake (cf. dial. dadder, confound, perplex), < ME. daderen, shiver, etc.; cf. redupl. didder-dodder, tremble; Icel. dadra (Haldorsen), dadkra (Clausby), wag the tail. Similar but independent forms are ditter = tester, and totter, q. v. See diddle and duddle.] To shake; tremble; shiver with or as with cold. Sherwood.

He did cast a squinting look upon Goatsnoe diddering and shivering his chaps. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, III. 20.

diddest (did'est). A rare and nearly obsolete form of didst.

diddle (did'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. diddled, ppr. diddling. [A var. of didder, the freq. suffixes -er and -le being interchangeable. Cf. daddle, and dadder mentioned under didder.] To dandle, as a child in walking; move rapidly up and down, or backward and forward; jog; shake. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

And when his forward strength began to bloom, To see him diddle up and down the room! O, who would think so sweet a babe as this Should e'er be slain by a false-hearted kins? Quarles, Divine Fancies, I. 4.

Lang may your elbow link an diddle. Burns, Second Epistle to Davie.

diddle (did'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. diddled, ppr. diddling. [A slang word, of obscure origin; perhaps < diddle, though the connection is not obvious. A connection with AS. dyderian, bedyderian, deceive, delude, is possible, but ME. forms are lacking.] To cheat; overreach by deception; swindle. [Slang.]

I should absolutely have diddled Hounslaw if it had not been for her confounded pretty face fitting about my stupid brain. Thackeray, Young Duke, II. 5.

diddler (did'ler), n. [< diddle + -er.] A cheat; a swindler. [Slang.]

didet. A Middle English form of did. See do.

didecahedral (di-dek-a-hē'dral), a. [< di-2 + decahedral.] In crystal., having the form of a decahedral or ten-sided prism with pentahedral or five-sided bases.

didelph (di'delf), n. A member of the Didelphina; a marsupial.

Didelphia (di-del'fi-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. di-, two- + delphō, womb. Cf. Didelphys.] The Marsupialia or marsupial inplacental mammals; one of the three subelasses of Mammalia, the other two being Ornithodelphia and Monodelphia. They have no placenta, and the womb double, whence the name—that is, the uterine dilatations of the oviducts continue through life distinct from each other, right and left, and open into two distinct vaginas, which debouch in turn into a urogenital sinus, forming, with the termination of the rectum, a common cloaca embraced by the external sphincter muscle, and in the male lodging the penis, which thus appears to protrude from the anus. The female has usually an abdominal pouch or marsupium, formed by a fold of the skin of the belly, in which the mammary glands open, and into which the blind, naked, and imperfectly developed young are received and carried for some time hanging to the nipples. The scrotum of the male occupies a similar position. Both the marsupium and the scrotum are supported to some extent by the marsupial bones characteristic of this group, being ossifications in the tendon of the external oblique muscle of the abdomen, articulated with the pubes. A cremasteric muscle in relation with these bones acts in the female upon the mammary glands, effecting their compression, and consequently the flow of milk into the mouth of the helpless young. There are true teeth of two or three kinds. The crocodil is reduced to a process of the scapula, as in ordinary mammals, not reaching the sternum, as in monotremes. The corpus callosum is rudimentary or wanting, and the brain relatively small. The Didelphia are among the oldest known mammals, and formerly had an extensive range, but are now mainly confined to the Australian region, the American opossums offering the principal exception. Some of the extinct forms were of great size; the kangaroos are the largest living representatives. The marsupials are notable for their great physiological adaptation to all the modes of life of ordinary mammals, their structure being modified in relation to the carnivorous, the herbivorous, the rodent, and other habitats, and their modes of progression and general economy being no less diverse. There is but one order, Marsupialia (which see).

didelphian, didelphic (di-del'fi-an, -fik), a. [< Didelphia + -an, -ic.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Didelphia.

didelphid (di-del'fid), n. A member of the Didelphia; especially, one of the Didelphidae.

Didelphidae, n. pl. [NL.] See Didelphia.

didelphoid (di-del'foid), a. [< Didelphia + -oid.] Double, as the uterus in the subelass Didelphia.

Didelphidae (di-del-fī-dē, di-del-fī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Didelphys + -idae.] A family of marsupial animals; the opossums. They have the feet pediformous—that is, the hind feet as well as the fore with an appressed thumb, and thus fitted for grasping; all the toes clawed excepting the hallux; the tail generally long, scaly, and prehensile; and the pouch in some forms complete, in others rudimentary or wanting. The dental formula is: 5 incisors in each upper, 4 in each lower half-jaw; 1 canine, 3 premolars, and 4 molars in each half-jaw. The vertebral formula is: cervical 7, dorsal 13, lumbar 4, sacral 3, caudal 19 or more. The family is confined to America, where it alone represents the division of marsupial mammals. The leading genera are Didelphys, including most of the species, and Chironomys, the water-opossum. See Didelphys, opossum.

Didelphys (di-del-fīs), n. [NL., < Gr. di, two-, + delphs, womb.] The typical and leading genus of marsupial placental mammals of the family Didelphidae, containing the American opossums which are not web-footed. The genus formerly covered nearly or quite all the marsupials. The species are terrestrial and arboreal, but not aquatic, the water-opossums being separated under the name Chironomys. The pouch is usually well developed, as in the best-known species, D. virginiana, the common opossum of the United States, but is rudimentary in some of the South American forms. See Didelphys, opossum.

Didemnidae (di-dem-nī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Didemnum + -idae.] A family of compound ascidians, typified by the genus Didemnum, having the body divided into thoracic and abdominal portions, and the viscera mostly situated behind the branchial cavity.

Didemnum (di-dem-num), n. [NL., < Gr. di, two-, + (1) dēmon, a bed.] A genus of ascidians, of the family Botryllidae, or made the type of a family Didemnidae. D. candidum is an example.

Dididae (di-dī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Didus + -idae.] A family of birds of which the dodo is the type. The leading genera are Didus and Pezophaps. See dodo.

didine (dī-dīn), a. [NL. didinus, < Didus, q. v.] Pertaining to the genus Didus or family Dididae; being or resembling a dodo.

didn't (dīd'nt), a. A contraction of did not, in frequent colloquial use.

dido (dī-dō), n. [ME. dido; in allusion to the familiar tale of the trick played by Dido, the legendary queen of Carthage, in bargaining for as much land as could be covered by a hide, and cutting the hide into a long thin strip so as to inclose a large tract: L. Dido, Gr. Dido.] 1. An old story.

"This is a Dido," quoth this doctor, "a discourse tale!"
Piers Plowman (C), xvi. 171.

2. A caper; a prank; a trick.—To cut a dido, to make mischief; play a prank; cut a caper.

Them Italian singers recitin' their jabber, showin' their teeth, and cuttin' didoes at a private concert.
Haliburton, Sam Slick in Eng.

didodecahedral (di-dō-dek-'a-hē-dral), a. [< di, + dodecahedral.] In crystal, having the form of a dodecahedral prism with hexahedral bases.

didopper (dīd'op-er), n. Same as didapper.

didrachm (dī-dram), n. [< didrachma, q. v.] A silver coin of ancient Greece, of the value of two drachms. See drachma.

Their [earlier coins of Corcyra's] reverse-type is, in the case of didrachma, two figures of square or oblong shape, whereof one has in the midst a small square and the other a small rhombus or lozenge. Num. Chron., ad ser., I. 3.

Before the age of Solon, Aeginetan didrachma averaging about 194 grs. would seem to have been the only money current in Attica as in Boeotia and Poloponnesus.
E. V. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. xlii.

didrachma (dī-drak'mē), n. [LL., < Gr. di, two-, + drachm, a double drachm, < dr, two-, + drachm, a drachm: see drachm.] Same as didrachma.

didrachmon (dī-drak'mon), n. Same as didrachma.

didst (dīdst). The second person singular of the preterit of do, do.

diducement (dī-dūs'ment), n. [< diduco (< L. diduco, draw apart, separate, < di, dis-, apart, + duco, draw; cf. deduco + -ment).] A drawing apart; separation into distinct parts. Bacon.

diduction (dī-duk'shun), n. [< L. diductio (n.), < diduco, pp. diductus, draw apart: see diducement.] Separation by withdrawing one part from the other.

Those [strings] that within the bladder drew so as to hinder the diduction of its side. Bayle, Works, I. 168.

diductively (dī-duk'tiv-ly), adv. By diduction or separation; inferentially.

There is scarce a popular error present in our dayes which is not either directly expressed or diductively contained in this work [Pliny's Natural History].
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., I. 3.

Didunculidae (di-dung-kū'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Didunculus + -idae.] A family of columbine birds, represented by the genus Didunculus.

Didunculinae (di-dung-kū'ī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Didunculus + -inae.] A subfamily of Columbidae, represented by the genus Didunculus.

Didunculus (di-dung-kū'ī-lus), n. [NL., dim. of Didus, the generic name of the dodo. See Didus.] A remarkable genus of pigeons, constituting the subfamily Didunculinae of the family Columbidae, or made the type of a different family, Didunculidae. It is considered to be the nearest living representative of the dodo, whence the name.

Tooth-billed Pigeon (Didunculus strigirostris).

The genus is also called Gnathodon, from the denticulation of the lower mandible. The tooth-billed pigeon of the Samoan Islands, D. strigirostris, is the only species; it is already a rare bird, and is likely to become extinct. The color is blackish; the total length is about 14 inches; the beak, besides being toothed, is remarkably large and strong, with a very convex culmen, like that of a bird of prey.

Didus (dī-dus), n. [NL., Latinized form of dodo, altered to give it a classical look, as if after Dido, the mythical foundress of Carthage: see dodo.] The typical genus of Dididae, containing the extinct dodo of Mauritius, D. ineptus. The general character of the genus is columbine or pigeon-like, but the size was comparatively enormous, the body massive and unwieldy, the wings unfit for flight, and the beak stout and hooked. The genus has become extinct since 1680. See dodo.

Didymic comma. See comma, 5 (b).

didymium (di-dīm'ī-um), n. [NL., < Gr. didymos, double, twofold, twin: see didymous.] 1. Chemical symbol, D or Di. A supposed element announced by Mosander in 1841, so named from being, as it were, the twin brother of lanthanum, previously discovered in the same minerals which yielded didymium, and from whose compounds those of didymium are separated with much difficulty. The most recent investigations have shown that didymium is not an element, but a mixture of two elementary substances.

2. [cop.] A genus of fungi belonging to the Myzomycetes. The sporangia have a double wall, which is covered externally with crystals of lime, either scattered or compacted into a separable crust.

didymous (dī-dī-mus), a. [< Gr. didymos, double, twofold, twin, < di, two-, + dim, = E. two, + suffix -ous.] 1. In bot., twofold; twin; growing double, as the fruits of umbelliferous plants, the anthers of bedstraw, or the tubers of some orchids.—2. In zool., twain; paired: applied to two spots, spines, tubercles, etc., when they form a pair touching each other.—Didymous wing-cell, in entom., a wing-cell almost but not quite divided into two by a projecting short nervure.

didynam (dīd'ī-nam), n. A plant of the class Didynamia.

Didynamia (dīd-i-nā'mī-ā), n. pl. [NL. (so named because the two larger stamens appear to dominate over the shorter), < Gr. di, two-, + dynamis, power: see dynamic.] The fourteenth class in the Linnean vegetable system, including plants with four stamens in unequal pairs. It was divided by Linnaeus into two orders: Gymnospermia, having the fruit composed of single-seeded achenes, which he mistook for naked seeds; and Angiospermia, with many seeds.

Didynamous Flower.

A. Angiospermia (Taraxacum Scordalis): a, stamen; d, divided ovary; c, section of ovary. B. Gymnospermia (Antirrhinum majus): c, stamens; d, capsule; e, section of capsule.

inclosed in an obvious seed-vessel. The first included most of the Labiata and Verbenacea, the latter many Scrophulariaceae, etc.

didynamian, didynamic (dīd-i-nā'mī-an, -nām'ik), a. [< Didynamia + -an, -ic.] Same as didynamous.

didynamous (dī-dī-nā-mus), a. [< NL. **didynamus*, < Gr. di, two-, + dynamis, power. Cf. Didynamia.] In bot., in two unequal pairs: applied to flowers having four stamens in two unequal pairs, as most Labiata, etc.; specifically, belonging to the class Didynamia.

didynamy (dī-dīn'g-mī), n. [< NL. **didynamia*, < **didynamus*: see didynamous.] In bot., the condition of being in two unequal pairs, as stamens.

die (dī), v. t.; pret. and pp. died, ppr. dying. [Early mod. E. also dye (and dial., Sc., etc., dee); < ME. dien, dien, deien, doyen, doghen, degen, digen, etc. (not in AS., where 'die' was expressed by sweltan (see swelt) or steorfan (see stare); but the derived forms dodd, dead, and death, death, occur), < Icel. deyta (strong verb, pret. dō, pp. dāinn) = Goth. **dēwan* (strong verb, pret. **dau*, pp. dēwans, found only as an adj. used as a noun, thata dēwano, the mortal, mortality, and in deriv. undēwanti, immortality); the other Teut. forms are weak: Norw. døya = Sw. dö = Dan. dø = OS. dōian = OHG. MHG. townen, die (cf. Goth. af-daujan, harass, distress, OFries. deia, deja, kill), < Teut. **daw*, whence also ult. E. dead and death, q. v. Cf. OEngl. dariti = Bohem. dariti = Russ. daviti, choke, = Lith. daviti, plague, vex.] 1. To cease to live; lose or part with life; expire; suffer death; perish: said of sentient beings, and used absolutely (as, all must die), or with of, by, or from, to express the cause of death, or with for to express the object or occasion of dying: as, to die of smallpox, or by violence; to die for one's country.

There dyed Seyute Johna, and was buried behynde the highe Awdere, in a Toubme. Manderiville, Travels, p. 52.
Christ died for our sins. 1 Cor. xv. 3.

And what we call to die, is not to appear
Or be the thing that formerly we were.
Dryden, Pythagorean Philos., I. 302.

"Whom the gods love die young," was said of yore.
Byron, Don Juan, iv. 12.

Every individual eventually dies from inability to withstand some envolving action.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 336.

2. To lose vital power or action; become de-vitalized or dead: said of plants or parts of plants, as a decayed tree or a withered limb or stem: as, certain plants die down to the ground annually, while their roots live.—3. To sink; faint.

His heart died within him, and he became as a stone.
1 Sam. xxv. 37.

Hence.—4. To come to an end or come to nothing; cease, or cease to exist; perish; be lost.

When I look upon the tombs of the great, every emotion of envy dies in me.

Addison, Thoughts in Westminster Abbey.

Whatever pleasure any man may take in spreading whispers, he will find greater satisfaction by letting the secret die within his own breast. Spectator.

Nothing died in him
Save courtesy, good sense, and proper trust.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 130.

5. To come to an end gradually; become extinct by degrees; vanish by or as if by death: usually with away, out, or down.

For 'tis much if a ship sails a life before either the Wind dies wholly away, or at least shifts about again to the South.
Dampier, Voyages, II. 31. 6.

So gently shuts the eye of day;
So dies a wave along the shore.
Mrs. Barbauld, Death of the Virtuosa.

There, waves that, hardly weitering, die away,
Tip their smooth ridges with a softer ray.
Wordsworth, Evening Walk.

The living airs of middle night
Died round the bulbous as he sung.
Teague, Arabian Nights.

The system of bribery did not long survive the ministry of Lord North. It may not have wholly died out; and has probably since been resorted to on rare and exceptional occasions.
Sir E. May, Const. Hist. Eng., I. vi.

In the course of his ten years' attendance, all the inmates died out two or three times, and were replaced by new ones.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 2.

6. To become less and less subject to, or cease to be under the power or influence of, a thing: followed by to or unto: as, to die to sin.—7. To languish with affection or love.

The young men acknowledged that they died for Rebecca.
Taylor.

8. To be consumed with a great yearning or desire; be very desirous; desire keenly or greatly: as, she was just dying to go. [Colloq.]—

9. In theol., to be cut off from the presence or favor of God; suffer eternal punishment in the world to come.

So long as God shall live, so long shall the damned die.
Hakewell, Apology.

To die away. (a) See def. 5. (b) To languish with pleasure or tenderness.

To sounds of heavenly harps die away,
And melts in visions of eternal day.
Pope, Elinala to Abeldar, l. 221.

To die game, to maintain a bold, resolute, and defiant spirit to the last.

Nor should we forget the game-cock, supplying as it does a word of enology to the mob of roughs who witness the hanging of a murderer, and who half condone his crime if he dies game. Dr. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 186.

Woods have this virtue: they are not easily discouraged; they never lose heart entirely; they die game.
J. Burroughs, Notes of a Walker, III.

To die hard. (a) To suffer, struggle, or resist in dying; be long in dying; part reluctantly with life. (b) To die in a hardened or impudent state.

That there are now and then instances of men who, . . . after leading very dissolute lives, have yet died hard, as the phrase is, without any seeming concern for what was past, or dread of what was to follow.

Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xvi.

To die in harness, to die while actively engaged in one's work.

I recommend in whom consumption is hereditary, whose occupation is in the open air, to take to heart the motto of this man, to make up their minds to die in harness.
Dr. Richardson, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 91.

To die in the last ditch, to fight to the end, preferring death to defeat.

"There is one certain means," replied the Prince (William of Orange), "by which I can be sure never to see my country's ruin—I will die in the last ditch."
Hume, Hist. Eng., 1672.

To die in the paint, to die in the attempt.

Amongst whom were a v. M. women, who bent to revenge the villainies done to their persons by the Romans, or to die in the paint.
Holinshed, Chron. (ed. 1577).

To die off, to die quickly, or in rapid succession or large numbers.

It is usual with sick men coming from the Sea, where they have nothing but the Sea-Air, to die off as soon as over they come within the view of the Land.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 113.

To die out. See def. 5.—To die the death (an intensive form for die), to die without fail; die in a predestined or threatened manner.

Of y<sup>e</sup> tree of knowledge of good and bad se that thou eate not: for euen y<sup>e</sup> same day thou eatest of it thou shalt die the death.
Gen. II. 17 (1551).

Either to die the death, or to allure
For ever the society of men.

Shak., M. N. D., I. 1.

—Eyn. 1. Die, Expire, Decease, Perish. To die is to cease to live, part with life, or become dead from any cause, and under any circumstances; it is the plainest and most direct of the words. Expire is often used as a softer word than die; it means to breathe out the life or emit the last breath. Decease is a euphemism, like expire, but is often an affection. Perish represents death as occurring under harsh circumstances of some sort, as violence or neglect; it emphasizes the idea of finality.

There taught us how to live; and (Oh! too high
The price for knowledge) taught us how to die.
Tickell, Death of Addison, l. 82.

One kiss the maiden gives, one last,
Long kiss, which she expire in giving.
Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

The thrice three Muses mourning for the death
Of learning, late deceas'd in boggery.
Shak., M. N. D., v. 1.

Prostrate the beauteous ruin lies, and all
That shared its shelter perish in its fall.
W. Pitt, Poetry of Anti-Jacobin, No. 36.

die<sup>2</sup>, v. and n. An obsolete spelling of dyel.
die<sup>3</sup> (di), n. pl. in the 1st sense, dies (diz). In def. 2 the word hardly admits of a plural. [The mod. sing. form die is due to the peculiar form of the pl., dice, ME. dys, etc. (see dice); the sing. would otherwise be **dec*, < ME. dec, < OE. do, earlier det, pl. dez, F. dé = Pr. dat = Sp. Pg. dato, a die, cube, pedestal (whence E. dado, q. v.) (cf. ML. datus, a die, after the Rom. forms), < L. datum, lit. what is given, but taken in the sense of 'what is cast or thrown,' neut. of datus, pp. of dare, give, in many phrases used equiv. to 'cast' or 'throw' (cf. G. würfel, a die, < werfen, throw). Thus die<sup>3</sup> is a doublet of dice<sup>1</sup>, datum, and dado: see dice<sup>1</sup>.] 1. A small cube marked on its faces with spots numbering from one to six, used in gaming by being thrown from a box or the hand, the chance being decided by the highest number of spots turned up, and in several other ways. The numbers on opposite faces of a die always add up to 7, but otherwise there is no uniformity in the arrangement of the numbers. The number of dice used is either one, two, three, or five, according to the game.

Roman Die, found in the south of France.

I have set my life upon a cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 4.

'Tis a precious craft to play with a false die
Before a cunning gamester.

Middleton and Rowley, Changeling, IV. 1.

Will ye go to the cards or die,
Or to a tavern fine?
Young, Hunting (Child's Ballads, III. 296).

Herodotus attributes both die and chess to the Lydians, a people of Asia; in which part of the world, it is most probable, they originated at some very remote but uncertain period.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 403.

2†. Hazard; chance.

Such is the die of war.
Spenser, F. Q.

3. Any small cube or square block.

Young creatures have learned spelling of words by having them pasted upon little flat tablets or dies.
Watts.

4. In arch., the cubical part of a pedestal between its base and cornice. See cut under dado.

Thus Rauch's monument of Frederick the Great at Berlin is . . . an equestrian colossus raised high upon two dies, of which, in each, the four faces are covered with paneled bas-reliefs; and around the lower die, upon an elevated stylobate, are grouped four equestrian figures on the corners, and between them twenty figures on foot, all colossal.
N. A. Rev., CXLI. 294.

5. An engraved stamp used for stamping a design, etc., in some softer material, as in coining money.

Such variety of dies, made use of by Wood in stamping his money, makes the discovery of counterfeits more difficult.
Neiff.

Sighting that Nature formed but one such man,
And broke the die—in moulding Sheridan.
Byron, Death of Sheridan, l. 117.

6. One of two or more pieces of hardened steel forming together a female screw for cutting the threads of screws. In use they are fitted into a groove in a contrivance called a die-stock, and are generally adjustable, so that one die may cut screws of different diameters.

7. In metal-working, a bed-plate or disk having an opening in the center, used in a punching-machine to support the metal from which any piece is punched.—8. A knife by which blanks of any desired shape and size are cut out, as in the sole-shaped cutting-dies used in shoe-factories.—Bit-brace die. See bit-brace.—Counter die, an upper die or stamp.—Loaded die, dice made heavier on one side than the others by the fraudulent insertion of a bit of lead, so that the highest number of spots shall be turned up when the dice are thrown in playing.

Professed gamblers . . . will not trust to the determination of fortune, but have recourse to many nefarious arts to circumvent the unwary; hence we hear of loaded dice, and dice of the high cut.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 404.

Open-die machine, a screw-threading machine having movable cutting-dies fitting in blocks in the traveling die-head, thus saving time in fitting in different dies. An insertable steel block with a universal clench to hold taps is provided for converting the machine quickly into a nut-tapper.—The die is cast, the affair is decided; the fate of the person or thing in question is settled; there is no recalling the act.—The whole box and dice, the whole number of persons or things. [ slang.] die<sup>3</sup> (di), v. t. i. pret. and pp. dying. [< die<sup>3</sup>, n.] To mold or form with a die or with dies.

Every machine made shoe also has an "inner-sole" died out or moulded to correspond in shape with the "outer sole."
Harper's Mag., LXX. 282.

die-away (di'ā-wā'), a. [Adj. use of phrase die away. See die<sup>3</sup>, 5.] Languid; languishing; expiring.

As a girl she had been . . . so romantic, with such a soft, sweet, die-away voice. Miss Edgeworth, Helen, xix.
Pray do not give us any more of those die-away Italian airs.
Kingley, Alton Locke, xiv.

dieb (dēb), n. A species of wild dog, Canis anthus, found in northern Africa.

die-back (di'bak), n. A disease affecting trees, particularly prevalent in the orange-plantations of Florida, causing the trees to die at the top.
Fallows.

diecian (di-s'han), a. Same as diaceous.

diecions, diecionally, etc. See diaceous, etc.

diado (dē-ā-dō), n. A Spanish long measure, the 16th part of the foot of Burgos, equal to 0.7 of an English inch.

diedral (di-s'dral), a. Same as dihedral.

Dieffenbachia (dē-fen-bak'i-ā), n. [NL., from the proper name Dieffenbach.] A genus of plants, of the natural order Araceæ, natives of tropical America. There are half-a-dozen species, of which two, D. Seguine and D. picta, are well-known decorative plants in greenhouses, varying exceedingly in the color and form of the foliage. The roots, as in many other plants of the order, are very acrid and caustic, and the name dumb-cane has been given to D. Seguine in the West Indies, from its effect upon the speech when its root is bitten.

diegnosis (di-ē-jō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. diagnosis, narration, < diagnosis, set forth in detail, narrate, < diá, through, + gnosis, lead.] In theol., that part of an oration in which the speaker makes his statement of facts; the narration (which see).

die-holder (di'hōl'dér), n. A form of chuck, consisting of a head-clutch or clamp, for dies in a stock, brace, or machine. E. H. Knight.

dielectric (di-ē-lek'trik), a. and n. [< di- for Gr. diá, through, + electric.] 1. a. Transmitting electric effects without conduction; non-conducting.—Dielectric after-working, a term used by Boltzmann for the phenomenon called by Faraday residual charge or electric absorption. See residual.—Dielectric capacity. Same as specific inductive capacity (which see, under capacity).

II. n. A substance through or across which electric force is acting. The walls of a Leyden jar; the intervening medium, solid, liquid, or gaseous, between the plates of a condenser; and the insulating sheath around the conductor of a telegraph-cable, are examples of dielectrics. Electric induction across a dielectric causes a stress in it which, if great enough, will produce rupture. The maximum intensity of this stress which the material can bear is called its dielectric strength. When the dielectric strength of the air between two clouds, or between a cloud and the earth, is unable to withstand the electric force, a flash of lightning takes place. The fracture of stones in buildings, of trees, etc., in a thunderstorm are illustrations of the effect of excessive dielectric stress.

Until this subject [induction] was investigated by Faraday, the intervening non-conducting body or dielectric was supposed to be purely negative, and the effect was attributed to the repulsion at a distance of the electrical fluid. Faraday showed that these effects differed greatly according to the dielectric that was interposed.

W. R. Grove, Corr. of Forces, p. 28.

Dielysia (di-el'i-trā), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + elytron, sheath, shard; see elytrum.] Same as Dicentra.

Diemenia (dē-mē-ni-ā), n. [NL., named from Van Diemen's Land.] A genus of venomous serpents, of the family Elapidae. D. reticulata is an example.

An abbreviation of diencephalon.

diencephal (di-en-sef'-al), n.

Same as diencephalon.

See extract under encephal.

diencephala, n.

Plural of diencephalon.

diencephalic (di'en-se-fal'ik or di-en-sef'-a-lik), a.

[< diencephalon + -ic.] Pertaining to the diencephalon. Also diencephalic.

diencephalon (di-en-sef'-a-lon), n.; pl. diencephala (-lā).

[NL., < Gr. diá, through, + tynggaleos, brain; see encephalon.] In anat., the inter-brain or middle brain, otherwise known as the diencephalon and thalamecephalon. It is that encephalic segment or division of the brain which lies between the mesencephalon and the prosencephalon, and consists chiefly of the optic thalami; its cavity is the third ventricle, or diacella. Also diencephal.

dier<sup>1</sup> (di'er), n. One who dies, or is about to die. [Rare.]

Aw. I should be dead
Before you were laid out!
Lac. Now lie upon thee for a hasty dier!
Middleton, More Drummers Besides Women, l. 1.

"I suppose I'm a dier," she said to me: "I used to think I never should die."

diéresis, diéresis (di-er'e-sis), n. [= F. diéresis = Sp. diéresis = Pg. diéresis = It. diéresis, < LL. diéresis, < Gr. diáireis, a division, distinction, separation, < diáireiv, divide, distinguish, separate, < diá, apart, + aireiv, take.] 1. The separate pronunciation of two vowels usually united as a diphthong; by extension of meaning, separate pronunciation of any two adjacent vowels, or the consequent division of one syllable into two. See dialysis and distractio, 8.—2. The sign (·) regularly placed over the second of two contiguous vowels to indicate that they are pronounced separately; the same sign used for other purposes. The diéresis is used most frequently over e preceded by a or o, in distinction from the diphthongs or digraphs ae and oe. In Greek manuscripts these dots were frequently written over a and e beginning a word or a syllable, thus serving also to show that they did not form the close of a diph-Ladislans . . . called an assembly of prelates, barons, and military gentlemen, in their respective provinces, in order to obtain an additional tribute. These provincial assemblies gave birth to the dictines; they now . . . only elect the nuncios or representatives for the diet.

J. Adams, Works, IV. 363.

Poland was torn by factions: its diets and dictines were hotbeds of intrigue.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 523.

dicting (di'e-ting), n. [Verbal n. of dict, v.]
1. The act of eating or taking nourishment.

You know not how delicate the imagination becomes by dicting with antiquity day after day.
Shelley, in Dowden, II. 256.

2. The act or process of subjecting to a diet or regimen.

It's the dicting and rubbing of the race-horse that makes him thin as a flash, that he may be as swift too.
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 333.

dictist (di'e-tist), n. [di + dict + -ist] One skilled in diet. Quarterly Rev.

dictition (di'e-tish'an), n. [dict + -tion for -tation] Same as dictist. Quarterly Rev. [Rare.]

dict-kitchen (di'et-kich'en), n. An establishment, usually connected with a dispensary or with the outdoor department of a hospital, for preparing and dispensing suitable diet for invalids, especially among the poor.

dictrichite (di'trich-it), n. [After the French mineralogist Dietrich (1748-93).] A hydrous sulphate of aluminium, zinc, and iron, occurring as a recent formation at Felső-Bánya in Hungary.

Dieu et mon droit (dié & môn drwo). [F. Dieu, < L. deus, a god; < L. et, and; mon, < L. meus, mine, < me, me; droit, < ML. directum, right; see deity, me, direct, adroit.] Literally, "God and my right," the watchword of Richard I. of England at the battle of Gisors in 1195, and adopted as the motto on the royal arms of England.

dieu-garde, n. [F. Dieu garde, God keep or save (you); as a noun, "an dieu-gard, a salutation, or a God save you" (Cotgrave): Dieu, God; garde, keep, save, guard; see deity and guard.] A form of salutation or asseveration.

And in this faith desires to be numbered in your family, so in your studies to attend, as your least beck may be his dieugarde.
Florio, It. Dict., Ep. Ded.

His master Harding could not produce so much as a probability of any vow anciently required or undertaken, whether by beek or Dieu-gard.
Bp. Hall, Works, IX. 278.

diety, n. An obsolete spelling of deity.

die-work (di'wérk), n. Surface ornamentation of metal by means of dies, upon which the metal is forced. The process is employed for metal in either a heated or a cold state; when executed upon cold metal, the work usually requires chasing to complete it.

diessengmenon (di-e-sing-me-non), n. [Gr. di- (ειρηνη); see diazoeche.] In Gr. music, the lower tetrachord of the upper octave in the two-octave or greater perfect system.

diff. 1. The assimilated form of dis- before f. See dis-. 2. A form of de- before f. See de-. diffame, v. and n. An obsolete (Middle English) form of defame.

diffamed (di-fámd'), p. a. [Pp. of diffame, v.] In her.: (a) Same as defamed. (b) Turned toward the sinister: said of an animal, especially a beast of prey, used as a bearing. [Rare.]

diffarreatio (di-far-fé-á-áhn), n. [L. diffarreatio (n.), < L. dis, apart, + farreatio (n.), for the more common L. confarreatio (n.), the use of spelt-cake in the marriage ceremony: see confarreatio.] The parting of a cake made of spelt: a ceremony among the Romans at the divorce of man and wife. See confarreatio.

diffence, v. An obsolete form of defence.

diffend, v. An obsolete form of defend.

differ (dif'er), v. [ME. diffe = F. diffé = Sp. diferir = Pg. differir = It. differire, < L. differre, carry apart, put off, defer (intr. differ, be different), < dis, apart, + ferre = E. bear; cf. Gr. διαφέρω, carry apart, differ (> διαφορά, difference, > ult. E. adaphorous, etc., diaphoretic), < dis, through, apart, + φέρω = L. ferre = E. bear. Cf. defer, a doublet of differ.] I. Intrans. 1. To be unlike, dissimilar, distinct, or various in nature, condition, form, or qualities: used absolutely or with from: as, the two things differ greatly; men differ from brutes; a statue *differ*s from a picture; wisdom *differ*s from cunning.

One star differeth from another star in glory.
1 Cor. xv. 41.

The courts of two countries do not so much differ from one another, as the court and city in their peculiar ways of life and conversation. Addison, Coffee House Politicians.

Even in the important matter of cranial capacity, Men differ more widely from one another than they do from the Apes; whilst the lowest Apes differ as much, in proportion, from the highest, as the latter does from Man. Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 68.

In all that I have seen, my main feeling is one of wonder how little the younger England differs from the elder. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 170.

2. To disagree; be of a contrary opinion; dissent; be at variance; vary in opinion or action: used absolutely or with from or with: as, they differ in their methods; he *differ*s from other writers on the subject.

If the honourable gentleman *differ*s with me on that subject, I differ as heartily with him. Canning.

The first thing that tests a boy's courage is to dare to differ from his father. W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 247.

They agree as to the object of existence; they differ as to the method of reaching it. J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, I. 4.

3. To express disagreement or dissent by word of mouth; come into antagonism; dispute; contend: followed by with.
We'll never differ with a crowded pit. Ross.

To differ by the whole of being, in logic, to have no essential resemblance, as an orange differs from virtue. —Syn. 1. To vary.

II. trans. 1. To cause to be different or unlike. [Rare.]

Something 'tis that *differ*s me and thee. Cowley.

2. To cause difference or dispute between; divide. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

If Master Angus and her mak it up, I've ne'er be the man to differ them. Seaton and Gael, I. 79.

3. To put off; defer. See defer.

differ (dif'er), n. [diff, v.] Difference. [Scotch.]

You see your state w' theirs compared,
An' shudder at the differ [exchange];
But cast a moment's fair regard
What mak's the mighty differ.
Burns, Address to the Unco Guid.

difference (dif'e-rens), n. [ME. difference, < OF. difference, F. différence = Sp. diferencia = Pg. differença = It. (obs.) differenza, differenza, < L. differentia, difference, < differe (-is, ppr., different: see different).] 1. The condition or relation of being other or different; the relation of non-identity; also, the relation between things unlike; dissimilarity in general.
Not like to like, but like in difference. Tennyson, Princess, vii.

2. Any special mode of non-identity; a relation which can subsist only between different things; also, a special relation involving unlikeness; a particular dissimilarity.
There is no difference between the Jew and the Greek. Rom. x. 12.

But at last it is acknowledged by the Men who love to be called the Men of wit in this Age of ours that there is a God and Providence, a future state, and the differences of good and evil. Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. iii.

Strange all this difference should be Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee.
Byron, Feuds between Handel and Buononcini.

3. A character which one thing or kind of things has and another has not.

Difference is the same that is spoken of many, which differ in fourme and kinde, when the question is asked, What manner of thing it is, as when we saie: What manner of thing is man? We must answer: He is endued with reason: If the question be asked, what a man is: We must answer by his Genus, or general words, he is a living creature. If the question be asked, what manner of thing a Beast is? We make saie: He is without the gift of reason. Every difference that is made prope to every thing, is naturally and substantially joyned to the kinde which is comprehended under the general words.
Sir T. Wilson, Rule of Reason (1581).

4. Controversy, or ground of controversy; a dispute; a quarrel.
Jack. What was the difference?
French. I think 'twas a contention in public.
Shak., Cymbeline, I. 5.

I would not, for more wealth than I enjoy,
He should perceive you raging; he did hear
You were at difference now, which hasten'd him.
Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, I. 2.

A right understanding of some few things, in differences amongst the sincere and godly, was procured.

N. Norton, New England's Memorial, p. 198.

I am myself a good deal ruffled by a difference I have had with Julia. Sherridan, The Rivals, iv. 3.

5. An evidence or a mark of distinction.
An absolute gentleman, full of most excellent differences. Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

6. The act of distinguishing; discrimination; distinction.
We make some things necessary, some things necessary and appendant only: . . . our Lord and Saviour himself doth make that difference. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 3.

To make a difference between the unclean and the clean. Lev. xi. 47.

7. In math.: (a) The quantity by which one quantity differs from another; the remainder of a sum or quantity after a lesser sum or quantity is subtracted. (b) The increment of a function produced by increasing the variable by unity. The operation of taking the difference in this sense is denoted by the letter  $\Delta$ . The second difference,  $\Delta^2$ , is the difference of the function that represents the difference of another. So third, fourth, etc., difference. The following table is an example:

$n$	$n^2$	$\Delta n^2$	$\Delta^2 n^2$	$\Delta^3 n^2$
1	1	7	12	6
2	4	9	10	6
3	9	13	7	6
4	16	17	4	6
5	25	21	1	6
6	36	25

8. In her., a bearing used to discriminate between shields or achievements of arms, as of brothers who inherit an equal right to the paternal coat. The most common form of differencing is cadency; another is the baston.
You must wear your rue with a difference. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 5.

9. On the exchanges, the amount of variation between the price at which it is agreed to sell and deliver a thing at a fixed time and the market-price of the thing when that time arrives. In wagering contracts, payment of the difference is expected and accepted in lieu of actual delivery.—10. A part or division.
There be of times three differences: the first from the creation of man to the Flood or Deluge, . . . the second from the Flood to the first Olympiad, etc.
Holland, tr. of Camden's Brit., p. 34.

[Difference is often followed by a prepositional phrase indicating the things or persons that differ. The preposition is usually between or among, or from, but sometimes also to (after the formula different to: see remarks under different).

What serious difference is there in this behavior [of plants] to that of the lower animals, the curious creatures of sea life which are hardly one thing or the other? Harper's Weekly, March 1, 1884, p. 143.]

Accidental difference, in logic, a difference in respect to some accident.—Actual difference, in metaph., one concerning what actually takes place.—Ascessional difference. See ascessional.—Calculus of finite differences. See calculus.—Descensional difference. See descensional.—Difference of potentials, or potential difference, in elect., the difference in degree of electrification of two bodies, or parts of the same body, which produces or tends to produce a flow of electricity or an electrical current between them. See potential.—Difference-tones. See tone.—Equation of differences. See equation.—First difference. See first.—Functional difference. (a) In math., the result of performing the operation of taking the difference once.—Individual difference. Same as numerical difference (b).

The many slight differences which frequently appear in the offspring from the same parents, or which may be presumed to have thus arisen, from being frequently observed in the individuals of the same species inhabiting the same confined locality, may be called individual differences. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 53.

Inverse difference, in math., the sum of all the values of a function, for all the discrete values of the variable less than the actual value.—Mixed differences, differences partly finite and partly infinitesimal (differential). See equation.—Numerical difference. (a) A difference of numbers, as between two assemblies of persons or things, two reckonings, or the like. (b) A difference between individuals of the same species: a character possessed by one individual and not by the others of the same species. Also frequently called individual, individuum, or singular difference.—Partial difference, in math., the increment of a function of two variables which would result from increasing one of them by unity.—Specific difference, in logic, a character which, added to the genus, makes the definition of the species. Also called essential, divisive, completive, or constitutive difference.—To make a difference, to alter a case; matter, or be material to a case: as, that makes a great difference; it makes no difference what you say.

If he miss the mark, it makes no difference whether he have taken aim too high or too low.

Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

Virtual difference, a difference in respect to what would happen under certain contingencies. Thus, one egg and another, though they appear to have no actual differences, may have virtual differences, in that one will hatch a male and the other a female.—Syn. 1 and 2. Difference, Distinction, Diversity, Dissimilarity, Disparity, Dissimilitude, Variance, Discrimination, contrariety, dissimilitude, variety. The first five words express the fact of unlikeness; differences and distinction apply also to that wherein the unlikeness lies, and discrimination to the act of making or marking a difference, and to the faculty of discerning differences. (See discernment.) Distinction applies also to the eminence conferred on account of difference. Differences is the most general, applying to things small or great, internal or external. Distinction is generally, but not always, external, and generally marks delicate differences: as, the distinction between two words that are almost synonymous. Diversity, by its derivation, is a great or radical difference, equal to going in opposite directions. Dissimilarity is unlikeness, generally in large degrees, or essential points. Disparity is inequality, generally in rank or age. Dissimilitude and variance are weak words by their original meaning, but through euphemistic use have come to stand for dissimilarity of opinion of almost any degree, and for the resulting alienation of feeling, or even dimension and strife.

The sub-kingdom Annulosa shows us an immense difference between the slow crawling of worms and quick flight of insects. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 1.

War is at this very moment doing more to melt away the petty social distinctions which keep generous souls apart from each other than the preaching of the Beloved Disciple himself would do. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 8.

The extent of country and diversity of interests, character, and attainments of voters represent the pretentious and undeserving. N. A. Rev., XL, 313.

If the principle of reunion has not its energy in this life whenever the attractions of self cease, the acquired principles of dissimilarity must repel these beings from their centre. Chayne.

The disparity between our powers and our performance is life's tragedy. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 44.

From these different relations of different things, there necessarily arises an agreement or disagreement of some things to others. Clarke, Attributes, xiv.

Even among the zealous patrons of a council of state, the most irreconcilable variance is discovered concerning the mode in which it ought to be constituted. Medison, The Federalist, No. xxxviii.

It is rather a question whether . . . they have not signed themselves beyond all the apprehensions and discriminations of what is good and what is evil. Sharp, Sermons, III, xvi.

4. Dissension, contest, falling out, strife, wrangle, altercation. *difference (dif'e-rens), v. t.; pret. and pp. differenced, ppr. differencing. [difference, n. Cf. differentiate, v.] 1. To cause a difference or distinction in or between; make different or distinct.*

One as the King's, the other as the Queen's, differenced by their garlands only. B. Jonson, Love's Welcome at Bolsover.

He that would be differenced from common things would be infinitely divided from things that are wicked. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1836), I, 634.

In the Samson Agonistes, colloquial language is left at the greatest distance, yet something of it is preserved, to render the dialogue probable; in Massinger the style is differenced, but differenced in the smallest degree possible, from animated conversation by the vein of poetry. Coleridge, Table-Talk.

2. To distinguish; discriminate; note the difference of or between.

And this was a non sequens, and in that he differenced him from the case of satovers, being an actual Tort to stub the wood up. Sir Peyton Ventris (1896).

3. In her., to bear with a difference; add a difference to.

Very frequently, even in the earliest times, the eldest son differenced his father's coat by a label. Encyc. Brit., XI, 637.

4. In math., to take the difference of (a function); also, to compute the successive differences of the numbers in a table.

difference-engine (dif'e-rens-en'jin), n. A machine for the automatic calculation of mathematical tables, from the initial values of the function and of its successive differences. See calculating-machine.

difference-equation (dif'e-rens-en'kw'zhon), n. In math., an equation of finite differences or enlargements; an expressed relation between functions and their differences. See equation.

differencing (dif'e-ren-sing), n. In her., the distinction between alleds made by one or more differences. See difference, n.

different (dif'e-rent), a. [F. différent = Sp. diferente = Pg. It. differente, < L. differen(-t-), ppr. of differre, differ: see differ, v.] Not the same; two; many; plural; also, characterized by a difference or distinction; various or contrary in nature, form, or quality; unlike; dissimilar.

I have been always so charitable as to think that the Religion of Rome and the Court of Rome were different things. Howell, Letters, II, 5.

All the elders met at Ipswich: they took into consideration the book which was committed to them by the general court, and were much different in their judgments about it. Winthrop, Hist. New England, II, 108.

Things terrestrial wear a different hue. As youth or age persuades; and neither true. Cromper, Hope.

[When in the predicate, different is either used absolutely: as, the two things are very different; or followed by from: as, the two things are very different from each other; he is very different from his brother. But the relation of opposition is often lost in that of mere comparison, leading to the use of to instead of from. This use is regarded as colloquial or incorrect, and is generally avoided by careful writers.

Different to is, essentially, an English colloquialism; and, like many colloquialisms, it evinces how much stronger the instinct of euphony is than the instinct of scientific analogy. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 63.

An amusement which was very different to that look of sentimental wonder. Theobald, Vanity Fair, p. 182.

—Byn, Different, Distinct, Separate, Several. These words agree in being the opposite of same. Different applies to nature or quality as well as to state of being; as, the African and Asiatic climates are very different. The other three words are primarily physical, and are still affected by that fact: we speak of distinct or separate ideas, colors, sounds, etc. Several is used chiefly of those things which are in some sense together without merging their identity: as, three several hands.

The heat at eighty degrees of Fahrenheit is one thing, and the heat at eighty degrees of Réaumur is a very different matter. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, xiv.

Is not every case of apparently continuous perception really a case of successive different images very close together? W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I, 115.

One poem, which is composed upon a law of its own, and has a characteristic or separate beauty of its own, cannot be inferior to any other poem whatsoever. De Quincey, Style, III.

You shall have very useful and cheering discourses at several times with two several men, but let all three of you come together, and you shall not have one new and hearty word. Shannon, Essays, 1st ser., p. 189.

differentia (dif'e-ren'shi-ē), n.; pl. differentia (-ē). [L. differentia: see difference, n.] 1. In logic, the characteristic attribute of a species, or that by which it is distinguished from other species of the same genus; specific difference (which see, under difference).

Whatever term can be affirmed of several things must express either their whole essence, which is called the species, or a part of their essence (viz., either the material part, which is called the genus, or the formal and distinguishing part, which is called differentia, or, in common discourse, characteristic), or something joined to the essence. Whately, Logic, I, 4.

2. In Gregorian music, a cadence or trope. Also called distinctio.

differentiable (dif'e-ren'shi-ē-bl), a. [*< NL. as if *differentiabilis, < *differentiare: see differentiate, v.*] Capable of being differentiated or discriminated.

In these exchanges of structure and function between the outer and qual-outer tissues, we get undeniable proof that they are easily differentiable. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 290.

differentia, n. Plural of differentia.

differential (dif'e-ren'shi-ēl), a. and n. [= F. différentiel = Sp. diferencial = Pg. diferencial = It. differenziale, < NL. differentiale (Leibnitz, 1676), < L. differentia, difference: see difference, n.] 1. a. 1. Making or exhibiting a difference or distinction; discriminating; distinguishing; special.

For whom he procured differential favors. Motley.

2. Having or exhibiting a difference.—3. In math., pertaining to a differential or differentials, or to mathematical processes in which they are employed.—Differential block, calculus, capacity. See the nouns.—Differential characters, in zool., the distinctive or diagnostic characters by which one organism is distinguished from another with which it is compared or contrasted: a statement of such characters constitutes a differential diagnosis.—Differential coefficient. See coefficient.—Differential coupling. See coupling.—Differential derivative. Same as differential coefficient.—Differential diagnosis. See diagnosis.—Differential duty. Same as differencing duty.—Differential gear, in const., etc. See the nouns.

Differential gun, in const., a combination of toothed wheels by which a differential motion is produced, as exemplified when two wheels fixed on the same axis are made to communicate motion to two other wheels on separate axes, the velocities of the latter axis differing proportionately to the difference of the diameters of the respective wheels acting upon them, or to the numbers of their teeth. This combination is extensively employed in lathes and boring-machines.—Differential invariant, a differential expression which is only multiplied by a power of dydx by a linear transformation of the variables.—Differential motion, a mechanical contrivance in which two pieces are connected at once in two ways, so that any velocity imparted to the one communicates to the other the difference of two velocities, as the Chinese windlass and the differential screw.—Differential piston, a single piston exposed on its opposite sides to different pressures, or a combination of pistons of different diameters connected so as to act as one, each under the same or a different pressure per unit of area. The total effective pressure is that due, in the case of the single piston, to the difference between the total pressures on the opposite sides, and, in the case of connected pistons of different diameters, to the difference of pressure upon a unit of area of each piston multiplied by the area of the piston.—Differential pulley. See pulley.—Differential pump, a steam-pump whose point of cut-off is controlled by the combined motions of the pump-rod, or its connections, and some independent moving part, so that the steam supply is determined by and apportioned to the load upon the pump.—Differential quotient. Same as differential coefficient.—Differential resolvent, a differential equation the complete integral of which contains all the roots of a given algebraic equation.—Differential scale. See scale.—Differential screw. See screw.—Differential thermometer. See thermometer.—Differential tone. See tone.—Differential winding, a method of winding coils for galvanometers, instruments for duplex telegraphy, and other electrical devices. It consists in winding two insulated wires side by side, so that each makes the same number of turns. For electric motors it is a series winding carrying current in a direction opposite to that in the shunt winding.

II. a. 1. In math.: (a) An infinitesimal difference between two values of a variable quantity. In the differential and integral calculus, if two or more quantities are dependent on one another, and subject to variations of value, their corresponding differentials are any other quantities whose ratios to one another are the limits to which the ratios of the variations approximate, as these variations are reduced nearer and nearer to zero; but the differentials are commonly understood to be infinitesimal. (b) A logarithmic tangent.—2. In biol., a morphological difference; a distinction or distinctive characteristic of form or structure: correlated with equivalent. [Rare.]

Characteristics are divisible into two categories: those which become morphological equivalents and are essentially similar in distinct series, and those which are essentially different in distinct series and may be classed as morphological differentia. A. Hyett, Proc. Amer. Assoc. Adv. Sci., XXXII, 358.

Partial differential, an infinitesimal increment of a function of two or more variables, corresponding to an infinitesimal increment of one of these variables.—Total differential, a sum of all the partial differentials of a function, so that more than one independent differential appear in its expression.

differentially (dif'e-ren'shi-ēl), adv. In a differential manner; by differentiation.

I will . . . state next what sorts of rights, forces, and ideas I consider.—mark differentially the three periods at which I have been looking. Stobbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 210.

differentiant (dif'e-ren'shi-ēnt), n. [*< NL. *differentiant(-t-), ppr. of *differentiare: see differentiate, v.*] In math., a rational integral function of the coefficients of a binary quantile, of equal weight in all its terms in respect to either variable, subject to satisfy the condition where a, b, c, etc., multiplied by binomial coefficients, give the c-coefficients of the quantile, and where D is the differentiant.—Monomial differentiant, a differentiant which (with the usual convention as to c = 1) may be expressed as a permutation-sum of a single product of differences of roots of the parent quantile, or quantic system. J. J. Sylvester.

differentiate (dif'e-ren'shi-ē-t), v.; pret. and pp. differentiated, ppr. differentiating. [< NL. *differentiatus, ppr. of *differentiare (> It. differenziare = Sp. diferenciar = Pg. diferencial = F. différencier, différentier), < L. differentia, difference: see difference, n.*] I. trans. 1. To make different; distinguish by differences; constitute a difference between: as, color of skin differentiates the races of men.*

Believing that sexual selection has played an important part in differentiating the races of man, he has found it necessary to treat this subject in great detail. A. R. Wallace.

Specifically.—2. In biol., to accomplish or develop differentiation in; make unlike by modification; specialize in structure or function.

The conversion of . . . protoplasm into various forms of organized tissues, which become more and more differentiated as development advances, is obviously referable to the vital activity of the germ. W. E. Carpenter, in Grove's Corr. of Forces, p. 414.

3. In logic, to discriminate between, by observing or describing the differences.—4. In math., to obtain the differential or the differential coefficient of: as, to differentiate an equation.

II. intrans. To acquire a distinct and separate character. Huxley.

differentiate (dif'e-ren'shi-ē-t), n. [*< NL. *differentiatum, neut. of *differentiatus: see differentiate, v.*] A differential coefficient.

differentiation (dif'e-ren'shi-ē-shon), n. [< differentiate, v.: see -ation.] 1. The formation of differences or the discrimination of varieties.

There can be no differentiation into classes in the absence of numbers. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 9.

The Faculties arose by process of natural differentiation out of the primitive universality. Huxley.

Specifically.—2. Any change by which something homogeneous is made heterogeneous, or like things are made unlike; especially, in biol., the evolutionary process or result by which originally indifferent parts or organs become differentiated or specialized in either form or function; structural or functional modification; specialization. Thus, the primitively similar appendages of a lobster undergo differentiation in being specialized, some into mouth-parts, some into prehensile claws, others into walking- or swimming-organs, etc.

In the contents of a single anther-cell we see a surprising degree of differentiation in the pollen: namely, grains cohering by fours, then being either tied together by threads or cemented together into solid masses, with the exterior grains different from the interior ones. Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 258.

Differentiation implies that the simple becomes complex or the complex more complex; it implies also that this increased complexity is due to the persistence of former changes; we may even say such persistence is essential to the very idea of development or growth. Encyc. Brit., XX, 45.

3. In logic, discrimination; the act of distinguishing things according to their respective differences.

The logical distinctions represent real differentiations, but not distinct existents.

G. H. Lewis, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 451.

4. In math., the operation of finding the differential or differential coefficient of any function. — Direct differentiation, differentiation by an elementary procedure. — Explicit differentiation, the differentiation of an explicit function of the independent variable. — Implicit differentiation, the opposite of explicit differentiation. — Partial differentiation, finding a partial differential. — Total differentiation, finding a total differential.

differentiator (dif'g-ren'shi-ā-tqr), n. One who or that which differentiates: as, the radicals of written Chinese serve as differentiators of the sense, while the phonetics play the same part as regards sound.

differentio-differential, a. Relating to differentials of differentials.

differently (dif'g-rent-li), adv. In a different manner; variously.

The questions have been settled differently in every church, who should be admitted to the feast, and how often it should be prepared. Emerson, The Lord's Supper.

differentness (dif'g-rent-ness), n. The state of being different. Bailey, 1727.

differring (dif'g-ring), p. a. [Ppr. of differe, v.]

1. Unlike; dissimilar; different.

As in Spain, so in all other Wine Countries, one cannot pass a Day's Journey but he will find a differring Race of Wine.

Wine nature by variety does please;

Clothe differring passions in a differring dress.

Dryden, Art of Poetry, III. 569.

2. Quarreling; contending; conflicting.

His differring fury. Chapman, Iliad, IX. 543.

O daughter of the rose, whose cheeks unite
The differring titles of the red and white.

Dryden, Fal. and Arc., Ded., I. 152.

differingly (dif'g-ring-li), adv. In a differring or different manner.

Such protuberant and concave parts of a surface may remit the light so differingly as to vary a colour. Boyle.

difficile (di-fis'il), a. [F. difficile = Pr. difficile = Sp. difícil = Pg. difícil = It. difficile, < L. difficile, in older form difficil, hard to do, difficult, < dis- priv. + facilis, easy: see facile. Cf. difficult.] 1. Difficult; hard; arduous; perplexing.

Mounts of Quarentena, where our Lord fasted .xl. days and .xl. nights: it is an hyche hyll and fyfyrty to ascende. Sir R. Gysfyrde, Dyffrymace, p. 52.

Latin was no more difficile

Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. I. 58.

2. Reluctant; scrupulous.

The cardinal finding the pope difficile in granting the dispensation. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

difficulness (di-fis'il-ness), n. Difficulty; impracticability; specifically, difficulty to be persuaded; incompliance.

The lighter sort of malignity turneth but to a crossness, or frowardness, or aptness to oppose, or difficulness, or the like. Bacon, Goodness.

difficultate, v. t. [L. as if **difficulta* (-)s for difficulta (-)s, difficulty. Cf. difficultate.] To render difficult.

The inordinateness of our love *difficultate*th this duty [charity]. W. Montague, Devoutie Essays, I. xv. § 4.

difficult (dif'i-kult), a. [Developed from difficult, q. v.; the proper ad. (after L.) is difficile, q. v.] Not easy; requiring or dependent on effort; hard; troublesome; arduous. Specifically —(a) Hard as to doing or effecting; wanting facility of accomplishment: with an infinitive: as, it is difficult to convince him; a thing that is difficult to do or to find.

Satire is . . . more difficult to be understood by those that are not of the same age with it than any other kind of poetry. Addison, Ancient Medals, II.

(b) Hard to do, perform, or overcome; attended with labor, pains, or opposition; laborious: as, a difficult undertaking.

There is as much Honour to be won at a handsome Retreat as at a hot Onset, it being the difficultest Place of War. Howell, Letters, II. 4.

Eloquence is not banished from the public business of this country as useless, but as difficult, and as not spontaneously arising from topics such as generally furnish the staple of debate. De Quincy, Rhetoric.

The difficult mountain-passes, where, from his rocky eyrie, the eagle-eyed Tyrolean peasant had watched his foe. Longfellow, Hyperion, IV. 2.

(c) Hard to please or satisfy; not compliant; unaccommodating; rigid; austere: as, a person of difficult temper.

Nothing will please the difficult and nice,
Or nothing more than still to contradict.

Milton, P. R., IV. 157.

Well, if he refuses, . . . I'll only break my glass for its battery. . . . and look out for some less difficult admirer. Goldsmith, the Stowp to Conquer, I. 1.

Olives and cypresses, pergolas and vines, terraces on the roofs of houses, soft iridescent mountains, a warm yellow light—what more could the difficult tourist want?

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 142.

(d) Hard to persuade or induce; stubborn in yielding; obstinate as to opinion: as, he was difficult to convince.

This offer pleasing both Armies, Edmund was not difficult to consent. Milton, Hist. Eng., VI.

His Majesty further said that he was so extremely difficult of miracles for fear of being imposed upon.  Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 16, 1685.

(e) Hard to understand or solve; perplexing; puzzling: as, a difficult passage in an author; a difficult question or problem. — Syn. Difficult, Hard, Arduous (see arduous), laborious, toilsome; obscure, knotty.

difficult (dif'i-kult), v. t. [F. difficile, make difficult, < difficulte, difficulty: see difficulty. In E. as if < difficult, a.] 1. To make difficult; impede.

Their pretensions . . . had difficulted the peace. Sir W. Temple, Works, II. 484 (Ord MS.).

2. To perplex; embarrass. [Local, U. S.]

There is no break in the chain of vital operation; and consequently we are not difficulted at all on the score of the relation which the new plant bears to the old.

George Bush, The Resurrection, p. 51.

difficultate (dif'i-kul-tāt), v. t. [< difficult + -ate.] To render difficult.

Difficultate. To difficultate, or difficultate; to make difficult or uneasy. Cotgrave.

difficultly (dif'i-kult-li), adv. With difficulty: as, gutta-percha is difficultly soluble in chloroform. [Rare.]

He himself had been only guilty, and the other had been very difficultly prevailed on to do what he did. Fielding.

difficulty (dif'i-kul-ti), n.; pl. difficulties (-tiz). [< ME. difficulte, < OF. difficile, F. difficile = Fr. difficile = Sp. difícil = Pg. difficulade = It. difficoltà, < L. difficulta (-)s, < difficil, older form of difficile, hard to do, difficult: see difficile and difficult.] 1. Want of easiness or facility; hindrance to the doing of something; hardness to be accomplished or overcome; the character or condition of an undertaking which renders its performance laborious or perplexing: opposed to facility: as, a work of labor and difficulty.

The next morning two peasants, subjects of Glingiro, shewed them the ford, where their beasts passed over with great difficulty and danger, but without loss.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 319.

2. That which is hard to accomplish or to surmount: as, to mistake difficulties for impossibilities.

The wise and prudent conquer difficulties by daring to attempt them. Rove.

3. Perplexity; complication or embarrassment of affairs, especially of pecuniary affairs; trouble; dilemma; whatever renders action or progress laborious or painful: as, a gentleman in difficulties.

Why do I make a difficulty in speaking of my worthy ancestor's fallings? Steele, Spectator, No. 544.

More than once, in days of difficulty
And pressure, had she sold her wares for less Than what she gave. Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

4. Objection; cavil; obstruction to belief or consent.

If the Sorcerers or Enchanters by their lots or divinations affirmed that any sickle blade should die, the sickle man makes no difficulty to kill his own son, though he had no other. Purchar, Pilgrimage, p. 288.

Men should consider that raising difficulties concerning the mysteries in religion cannot make them more wise, learned, or virtuous. Swift.

It seems, then, that difficulties in revelation are especially given to prove the reality of our faith.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 211.

5. An embroilment; a serious complication of feeling or opinion; a falling out; a variance or quarrel.

Measures for terminating all . . . difficulties. Benbow.

—Syn. 1. Laboriousness, troublesomeness, arduousness. — 2. Obstruction, impediment, etc. (see obstacle), hindrance. — 3. Distress, exigency, trial, emergency, pinch.

diffidet (di-fid'), v. t. [< It. diffidare, < L. diffidere, distrust, < dis- priv. + fidere, trust, < faide, faith: see faith, fidelity. See also defy, diffident, and cf. affid, confide.] To have or feel distrust; have no confidence.

Mr. Pinch. No, Sir, I'll ne'er trust you any way.

Horn. But why not, dear Jack? why diffide in me thou know'st so well? Wycherley, Country Wife, IV. 1.

The man diffides in his own augury,
And doubts the gods. Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., I. 583.

diffidence (dif'i-dens), n. [< Sp. diffidencia = Pg. diffidencia = It. diffidenza, diffidencia, < L. diffidentia, want of confidence, < diffiden (-)s, ppr. of diffidere, distrust: see diffident. See also defiance.] 1. Distrust; want of confidence in regard to anything; doubt of the ability or disposition of others. [Now rare or obsolete in this application, originally the prevailing one.]

Hee had brought the Parliament into as just a diffidence of him, as that they durst not leave the Public Armes to his disposal, much less an Army to his conduct. Milton, Minorities, XII.

To Israel, diffidence of God, and doubt In feeble hearts. Milton, S. A., I. 464.

2. More especially, distrust of one's self; want of confidence in one's own ability, worth, or fitness; retiring disposition; modest reserve; shyness.

Be silent always, when you doubt your sense;
And speak, though sure, with seeming diffidence. Pepe, Essay on Criticism, I. 507.

She lifts . . . [her eyes] by degrees, with enchanting diffidence. Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 2.

An Englishman's habitual diffidence and awkwardness of address. Iving.

By learning conspicuous before the world, his [John Pickering's] native diffidence withdrew him from his personal observation. Sumner, Orations, I. 138.

—Syn. 2. Modesty, Shyness, etc. (see bashfulness), fear, timidity, hesitation, apprehension.

diffident (dif'i-dent), a. [< Sp. diffidente = Pg. It. diffidente, < L. diffiden (-)s, ppr. of diffidere, distrust: see diffide. See also defiant.] 1. Distrustful; wanting confidence in another's power, will, or sincerity. [Now rare or obsolete.]

Piety so diffident as to require a sign. Jer. Taylor.

Be not diffident
Of wisdom: she deserts thee not, if thou Dismisse her not. Milton, P. L., VIII. 562.

2. Distrustful of one's self; not confident; reserved; timid; shy: as, a diffident youth.

Distress makes the humble heart diffident. Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe.

The limited nature of my education, . . . so far from rendering me diffident of my own ability to comprehend what I had read, . . . merely served as a further stimulus to imagination. Poe, Tales, I. 7.

Although Ximenes showed no craving for power, it must be confessed he was by no means diffident in the use of it. Prescott, Forl. and Is., II. 6.

The diffident account each other with a certain coy respectfulness, having its rise in self-reverence, a regard for persons and principles. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 82.

—Syn. 2. Bashful, shamed, ashamed, sheepish.

diffidently (dif'i-dent-li), adv. With distrust; in a shy or hesitating manner; modestly.

In man humility's alone sublime,
Who diffidently hopes he's Christ's own care. Smart, Hymn to the Supreme Being.

diffidentness (dif'i-dent-ness), n. Distrust; suspiciousness. Bailey, 1727. [Rare or obsolete.]

diffind (di-find'), v. t. [< L. diffindere, pp. diffissus, cleave asunder, < dis-, asunder, < findere, cleave, split, = E. bite, q. v.] To cleave in two. Bailey, 1727.

diffinet, v. a. A Middle English variant of define.

To diffyne
Al here sentence. Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, I. 529.

diffiniate, v. t. A Middle English variant of define.

diffinition, n. A former variant of definition.

diffinitive, a. A former variant of definitive.

The tribunal where we speak being not diffinitive (which is no small advantage), I now promised to ease his memory myself with an abstract of what I had said.

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiae, p. 537.

diffisance (di-fish'qn), n. [< L. diffissio (-)n, breaking off a matter till the following day, deferring it, lit. a cleaving in two, < diffindere, pp. diffissus, cleave in two: see diffind.] The act of cleaving asunder. Bailey, 1727.

diffixed (di-fikst'), a. [*< ML. as if *diffixus*, < L. dis-, apart, + fixus, pp. of figere, fix: see fix.] Loosened; unfixed. Bailey, 1727.

difflation (di-fis'ashn), n. [*< L. as if *difflatio* (-)n, < difflare: see difflate.] A blowing in different directions; a scattering by a puff of wind. Bailey, 1727.

diffuse (dif'fūz), n. [< L. diffusus, flow away, < dis-, apart, + fundere, flow: see fund.] A chemical compound obtained by the action of heat on alloxanic acid. It is not crystallizable, is very soluble in water, and possesses no acid properties. Also spelled diffusan.

diffusance (dif'fūz-ns), n. [< F. diffusance = Pg. diffusancia; as diffusant (-) + -ce.] 1. The quality of flowing away on all sides, as a fluid; fluidity; opposed to consistence. Also diffusency.

—2. In soil., specifically, the peculiar mode of disintegration or dissolution of infusorians; the "molecular effusion" of Dujardin.

diffusency (dif'fūz-en-si), n. [< diffusant (-) + -cy.] Same as diffusance, 1.

Ice is water congealed by the frigidty of the air; where-by it acquirith no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffusency.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 1.

diffusant (dif-fu-zant), a. [= F. diffusant = Pg. diffusante, < L. diffusus (-t-), ppr. of diffundere (> Sp. disfunde), flow in different directions, < dis-, away, apart, + funde, flow: see fundus.] Tending to flow away on all sides; not fixed; readily dissolving.

A formless, apparently diffusant and structureless mass. A. Gray, in Nat. Sci. and Biol., p. 14.

Diffugia (di-fu'ji-gi), n. [NL., formed (improp.) from the L. base diffug- (as in pp. diffusus) of diffundere, flow apart: see diffundere.] A genus of ordinary amoebiform rhizopods, of the order Amoeboides and family Amoebidae, having a kind of test or shell made of foreign particles agglutinated together, as grains of sand, diatoms, etc.: so called from the flowing out or apart of the pseudopods. D. arceolata is an example.

diffurm (dif-furm), a. [F. difforme, OF. de-forme = Sp. Pg. difforme = It. difforme, < ML. difformis, var. of L. deformis, deformed: see deform, a.] 1. Irregular in form; not uniform; anomalous; deformed.—2. Unlike; dissimilar.

The unequal refractions of diffurm rays. Newton.

difformed (di-furm'd), a. Same as diffurm.
difformity (di-furm'-ti), n.; pl. difformities (-ties). [F. difformité = Sp. difformidad = Pg. difformidade = It. difformità, < ML. difformita (-t-), var. of L. deformita (-t-), deformed: see diffurm and deformity.] Difference or diversity in form; lack of uniformity.

Just as . . . hearing and seeing are not inequalities or difformities in the soul of man, but each of them powers of the whole soul. Clarke, Ana. to Sixth Letter.

diffract (di-frakt'), a. [F. diffractions, pp.: see the verb.] In lichenology, broken into distinct areoles separated by chinks.

diffractioned (di-frak'ted), a. [F. diffraction + -ed.] In entom., bending in opposite directions: as, elytra diffractioned at the tips.

diffraction (di-frak'shun), n. [= F. diffraction = Pg. diffraction = It. diffrazione, < L. as if diffraction (-s-), < diffingere, pp. of diffingere, break in pieces: see diffract, v.] 1. In optics, the spreading of light or deflection of its rays, accompanied by phenomena of interference: occasioned by the neighborhood of an opaque body to the course of the light, as when it passes by the edge of an opaque body or through a small aperture, the luminous rays appearing to be bent or deflected from their straight course and mutually interfering with one another. See interference.

Diffraction Bands.

Thus, if a beam of monochromatic light is passed through a narrow slit and received on a screen in a dark room, a series of alternately light and dark bands or fringes is seen, which diminish in intensity and distinctness on either side of the central line; if white light is employed, a series of colored spectra of different orders is obtained. Similar phenomena of diffraction are obtained from diffraction gratings, which consist of a band of equidistant parallel lines (from 10,000 to 30,000 or more to the inch), ruled on a surface of glass or of polished metal; the spectra obtained by this means are called interference or diffraction spectra. They differ from prismatic spectra, since in them the colors are uniformly distributed in their true order and extent according to their difference in wave-length; while in the latter the less refrangible (red) rays are crowded together, and the more refrangible (blue, violet) are dispersed. Diffraction gratings are now much used, especially in studying the solar spectrum. The best gratings are ruled on speculum metal with a concave surface (often called Rowland gratings, after Professor Henry A. Rowland of Baltimore), and give an image of the spectrum directly, without the intervention of a lens.

The street lamps at night, looked at through the meshes of a handkerchief, show diffraction phenomena.

Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 95.

This diffraction grating is merely a system of close, equidistant, parallel lines ruled upon a plate of glass or polished metal.

C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 73.

Hence—2. In acoustics, the analogous modification produced upon sound-waves when passing by the edge of a large body, as a building. The chief difference between the two classes of phenomena is due to the relatively enormous length of the waves of sound, as compared with those of light.—Diffraction circles. See circles.

diffraction (di-frak'tiv), a. [= F. diffraction; as diffract + -ive.] Pertaining to diffraction; causing diffraction.

diffractionally (di-frak'tiv-ly), adv. By or with diffraction; in a diffraction manner.

In the first place, a marked distinction is to be drawn between those objectives of low or moderate power which are to be worked dioptrically and those of high power which are to be worked diffractionally.

W. B. Carpenter, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 282.

diffractionist, diffractionism (di-fran'chis or -chis, di-fran'chis-mnt or -chis-mnt). Same as diffractionist, diffractionism.
diffractionality (di-fran'chil'i-ti), n. [F. diffraction: see diffraction.] The quality of being diffractional; the degree of diffraction.

The refrangibility of a ray and its diffractionality, if we may coin the word, both depend upon the number of pulsations per second with which it reaches the diffracting or refracting surface. C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 93.

diffractionable (di-fran'chil-ib), a. [F. diffraction, assumed for diffraction, break (see diffraction), + -ible.] Capable of being diffracted, as light passing through a narrow slit, or reflected from a diffraction grating. See diffraction, 1.

diffugient (di-fu'ji-ent), a. [F. diffugien (-t-), ppr. of diffugere, flee in different directions, scatter, disappear, < dis-, apart, + fugere, flee.] Dispersing; fleeing; vanishing. [Rare.]

To-morrow the diffugient snows will give place to spring. Thackeray, Round about the Christmas Tree.

diffuse (di-fu'st), n. [F. diffuse + -at-]. The solution of crystalline or diffusible substances resulting from dialysis.

diffuse (di-fu's), v.; pret. and pp. diffused, ppr. diffusing. [= F. diffuser, < L. diffusus, pp. of diffundere, pour in different directions, spread by pouring, pour out, < dis-, away, + fundere, pour: see fusus.] 1. To pour out or spread, as a fluid; cause to flow and spread. Our bounty, like a drop of water, disappears when diffused too widely. Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, iii.

2. To spread abroad; scatter; send out or extend in all directions. The mind, when it is withdrawn and collected into itself, and not diffused into the organs of the body, hath some extent and latitude of premonition. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 204.

Believe her [Vanité] not, her glass diffuses False portraits. Quarles, Emblems, ii. 6.

All around A general sigh diffused a mournful sound. Congreve, II. 4.

I see thee sitting crown'd with good, A central warmth diffusing bliss. Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxxiv.

—Syn. 2. To scatter, disseminate, circulate, disperse, distribute, propagate. II. intrans. To spread, as a fluid, by the wandering of its molecules in amongst those of a contiguous fluid. Thus, if a layer of salt water be placed beneath fresh water, the salt water will gradually penetrate into the fresh water, against the action of gravity.

diffuse (di-fu's), a. [ME. diffuse (in adv. diffuseli) = OF. diffus, F. diffus = Sp. diffuso = Pg. It. diffuso, < L. diffusus, pp.: see diffuse, v.] 1. Widely spread or diffused; extended; dispersed; scattered. A diffuse and various knowledge of divine and human things. Milton, To the Parliament of England. Specifically—(a) In pathol., spreading widely and having no distinctively defined limits: as, a diffuse inflammation or suppuration: opposed to circumscribed. (b) In bot., spreading widely and loosely. (c) In anat., applied to a form of non-deciduate placenta in which the fetal villi form a broad belt. (d) In soil, sparse; few and scattered, as markings; especially, in entom., said of punctures, etc., when they are less thickly set than on a neighboring part from which they appear to be scattered off.

2. Prolix; using many words; verbose; rambling: said of speakers and writers or their style. The reasoning of them is sophistical and inconclusive; the style diffuse and verbose. J. Warton, Essay on Pope. He was a man of English make, taciturn, of few words, no diffuse American talker. W. Phillips, Speeches, p. 163. 3. Hard to understand; perplexing; requiring extended effort. The town-clerk of the said cite for the tyme beinge shall yve no judgement in the Baillies name of the same cite for the tyme beinge, in or vpon any diffuse matter bifore them, without the aduise of the Recorder of the same cite for the tyme beinge. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 400.

John Lydgate Wryteth after an hyer rule; It is diffuse to tynge The sentence of his mynd. Skelton, Phyllip Sparowe, l. 305.

Diffuse ganglion. See ganglion.—Syn. 2. Loose, rambling, wordy, long-winded, diluted, spun out.

diffused (di-fu'sd'), p. a. [Pp. of diffuse, v.] 1. Spread; dispersed.

It is the most flourishing, or, as they may be called, the dominant species—those which range widely, and are the most diffused in their own country, and are the most numerous in individuals—which oftenest produce well-marked varieties, or, as I consider them, incipient species. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 93.

The gray hidden moon's diffused soft light . . . His sea-girl island prison did but show. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, l. 403.

3. Spread out; extended; stretched. See how he lies at random, carelessly diffused, With languish'd head unprop'd. Milton, S. A., l. 113.

3. Confused; irregular; wild; negligent. Let them from forth a saw-pit rush at once, With some diffused song. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 4.

But [we] grow, like savages, . . . To swearing, and stern looks, diffused attire, And everything that seems unnatural. Shak., Ham. V., v. 2.

The strangest pageant, fashioned like a court, (As less I dreamt I saw it) so diffused, So painted, plect, and full of rainbow strains, As never yet, either by times or colors, Was made the food to my distracted sense. E. Jones, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 2.

4. In soil, ill-defined; without definite edges: applied to colored marks when they appear to merge gradually into the ground-color at their edges, and especially to marks on the wings of butterflies and moths when the scales forming them become scattered at the edges.

diffusely (di-fu'sed-ly), adv. 1. In a diffused manner; with wide dispersion.—2. Confusedly; irregularly; negligently (as to dress).

Go not so diffusely; There are great ladies purpose, sir, to visit you. Fletcher (and another), Nice Valour, iii. So diffusely written that letters stood for whole words. Holmshad, Descrip. of Ireland, xiii.

3. In soil, in a spreading manner; so as to fade into the surrounding parts: as, a mark diffusely paler on one side.

diffuseness (di-fu'sed-ness), n. The state of being widely spread.

Mr. Warburton's text, as well as all others, read "She would infect to the north-star;" and it is the diffuseness, or extent of her infection, which is here described. T. Edwards, Canons of Criticism, xxii.

diffusely (di-fu's-ly), adv. [ME. diffuseli; < diffuse + -ly<sup>2</sup>.] 1. Widely; extensively.

Please'd that her magic fame diffusely flows, Thus with a horrid smile the lag replies. Row, Lucan, vi.

2. Copiously; amply; fully; prolixly.

Luk . . . telleth more diffusely how men steth [scandeth] up to God, from Adam to the Trinitie (Luke iii. 23-25). Wyclif, Select Works (ed. Arnold), l. 291.

A sentiment which, expressed diffusely, will barely be admitted to be just; expressed concisely, will be admired as spirited. Blair, Lectures, xviii.

3. In entom., thinly and irregularly: as, a surface diffusely punctured.

diffuseness (di-fu's-ness), n. The quality of being diffuse; specifically, in speaking or writing, want of concentration or conciseness; prolixity.

The diffuseness of Blue-Books has been a standard subject of criticism since Blue-Books began. Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 504.

diffuser (di-fu's-er), n. One who or that which diffuses; specifically, in physics, an apparatus consisting of a number of thin metal plates, designed to conduct away the heat of a thermoelectric battery by exposing a large surface to the air. Also spelled diffuser.

It is his mastery of ridicule which renders Sydney Smith so powerful as a diffuser of ideas, for in order to diffuse widely it is necessary to be able to address fools. Lady Holland, in Sydney Smith, ii.

diffusibility (di-fu'sil-i-ti), n. [F. diffusibilité: see diffuse.] The tendency of a fluid to penetrate a contiguous fluid by the wandering of its molecules.

Water is probably a liquid of a high degree of diffusibility; at least it appears to diffuse four times more rapidly than alcohol, and four or six times more rapidly than the less diffusive salts. J. Graham, Phil. Trans., 1833, p. 173.

diffusible (di-fu'si-bl), a. [= F. diffusible; as diffuse + -ible.] Capable of diffusing, as a fluid; diffusive.—Diffusible stimulants. See stimulant.

diffusibleness (di-fu'si-bl-ness), n. Diffusibility. Craig.

diffusile (di-fu'sil), a. [F. diffusile, diffusive, < diffusus, pp. of diffundere, diffuse: see diffuse, v.] Spreading. Bailey, 1727.

diffusionmeter (dif-fu-sim'e-ter), n. Same as diffusionmeter.

diffusionometer (di-fu-si-on'e-ter), n. [Irreg. < L. diffusio (-n-), diffusion, + metrum, a measure.] An apparatus devised by Graham for ascertaining the rate of diffusion between gases. It consists essentially of a tube, containing the gas under experiment, with the lower end plunged in mercury and the upper end closed with a porous plug; the rate of diffusion is determined from the rapidity with which the mercury rises in the tube as the diffusion of the gas goes on through the porous plug.

diffusion (di-fu'zhun), n. [= F. diffusion = Pr. diffusio = Sp. difusion = Pg. difusão = It. diffusione, < L. diffusio (-n), < diffundere, pp. diffusus, diffuse: see diffuse, v.] The act of diffusing, or the state of being diffused. (a) The gradual and spontaneous molecular mixing of two fluids which are placed in contact one with the other. It takes place without the application of external force and even when opposed by the action of gravity. It is explained by the motion and mutual attraction of the molecules of the two fluids. Diffusion is most rapid and marked between gases, but is also an important phenomenon of liquids. See diffusion of gases and diffusion of liquids, below.

The process of diffusion is one which is continually performing an important part in the atmosphere around us. Respiration itself, but for the process of diffusion, would fall in its appointed end.

W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., I. iii. § 3.

(b) A scattering, dispersion, or dissemination, as of dust or seed, or of animals or plants.

The process of diffusion would often be very slow, depending on climatal and geographical changes, on strange accidents, and on the gradual acclimatization of new species to the various climates through which they might have to pass.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 305.

(c) Propagation or spread, as of knowledge or doctrine.

Another measure of culture is the diffusion of knowledge.

Emerson, Civilization, p. 21.

To our medieval forefathers the great diffusion of the arts of reading and writing which followed on the invention of printing was a boon beyond all words.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 342.

(d) Diffuseness; prolixity.

To abridge

Diffuseness of speech. Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 295.

Diffusion apparatus, an apparatus sometimes employed for extracting the sugar from cane or beet-root by dissolving it out with water.—Diffusion circles, luminous circles, as those thrown upon a screen by a lens when the object is either too near or too far to be in exact focus.—Diffusion of electricity and magnetism, propagation analogous to the conduction of heat.

This diffusion and decay of the induction-current is a phenomenon precisely analogous to the diffusion of heat from a part of the medium initially hotter or colder than the rest.

Clark Maxwell.

Diffusion of force, the phenomena of viscosity in moving fluids.—Diffusion of gases, the diffusion through each other which takes place when two bodies of gas are placed in contact, as when a bell-jar of hydrogen is placed over one containing oxygen. After a certain time a homogeneous mixture is obtained, even if the heavier gas is placed below. When separated by a porous diaphragm the relative rate of diffusion can be measured (see diffusionometer); it is found to be the more rapid with the lighter gas.—Diffusion of heat. (a) A phrase employed to express the modes by which the equilibrium of heat is effected, viz. by conduction, radiation, and convection. The term is also used, like diffusion of light (see light), to describe the irregular reflection or scattering of the incident heat (and light) from the surface of a body not perfectly smooth. (b) Conduction of heat.—Diffusion of liquids, the diffusion through each other which occurs when two liquids that are capable of mixing, such as alcohol and water, are placed in contact, even in spite of the action of gravity. It is closely related to the phenomena of osmosis and endosmosis (which see), which take place when the liquids are separated by a porous diaphragm. See also diethylene.—Diffusion of taxes, the theory that the community as a whole must bear the burden of any tax, no matter upon what commodity or person it is originally levied. This theory rests on the assumption of perfect competition.—Diffusion tube, an instrument for determining the rate of diffusion for different gases.—Fig. Spread, circulation, expansion, dissemination, diffusion.

diffusion-osmose (di-fu'zhun-os'mōs), n. Osmose due to the diffusibility of the liquids, and not to the chemical action of the membrane.

diffusion-volume (di-fu'zhun-vol'ūm), n. The volume of a fluid which diffuses into a second in the same time that a given volume of the second diffuses into the first.

diffusive (di-fu'siv), a. [= F. diffusif = Sp. difusivo = Pg. It. diffusivo, < *L. as if *diffusivus*, < diffusus, pp. of diffundere, diffuse: see diffuse.] 1. Having the quality of diffusing or spreading by flowing, as fluids, or of dispersing, as minute particles: as, water, air, light, dust, smoke, and odors are diffusive substances.

All liquid bodies are diffusive.

T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Diffusive Cold does the whole Earth invade, Like a Disease, through all its Veins 'tis spread.

Congress, Limit of Horace, I. ix. 2.

2. Extending in all directions; widely reaching; extensive: as, diffusive charity or benevolence.

No fear that the religious opinions he holds sacred, . . . or the politics he cultivates, . . . will keep back any from his share of the diffusive good.

R. Christie, Addresses, p. 308.

He [Hartley Coleridge] thinks intellect is now of a more diffusive character than some fifty years since, for progressive it can not be.

Caroline Fox, Journal, p. 21.

I span in star and flower
To feel these sense diffusive powers.

Tompason, in Memoriam, cxxx.

diffusively (di-fu'siv-lī), adv. Widely; extensively; in every direction.

diffusiveness (di-fu'siv-nes), n. 1. The state or character of being diffusive: as, the diffusiveness of odors.—2. The quality or state of being diffusive, as an author or his style; verboseness; copiousness of words or expression.

Of a beautiful and magnificent diffusiveness Cicero is, beyond doubt, the most illustrious example.

Beair, Rhetoric, xviii.

diffusivity (dif-fu'siv'i-ti), n. [diffusive + -ity.] The power or rate of diffusion. [Rare.]

The diffusivity of one substance in another is the number of units of the substance which pass in unit of time through unit of surface. Test, Properties of Matter, p. 257.

diffuser (di-fu'spr), n. See diffuser.

dig (dig), v.; pret. and pp. dig or digged, ppr. digging. [ME. diggen, dyggen (once deggen, for a rhyme) (pret. diggede, digged, ppr. digged), prob. altered (through Dan. influence) from earlier diken, usually diken or assimilated dichen, dig, < AS. dician, make a ditch (= Dan. dige, raise a dike, = Sw. dikka, ditch, dig ditches), < dico, a ditch, etc.: see dike, ditch, v. and n. The pret. dig, for earlier digged, like stuck for stoked, is modern.] I. trans. 1. To make a ditch or other excavation; turn up or throw out earth or other material, as in making a ditch or channel or in tilling: as, to dig in the field; to dig to the bottom of something.

Thel went to the treasure, as Merlin hem taught, in the forests, and lette digge in the erthe and fonde the treasure that neuer or (before) was seyn, and took it oute of the erthe.

Martin (R. E. T. S.), II. 370.

I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed. Luke xvi. 3.

The scripture says, Adam digged: Could he dig without arms?

Shak., Hamlet, v. 1.

2. To study hard; give much time to study; grind. [Students' slang, U. S.]

Here the sunken eye and sallow countenance bespoke the man who dug sixteen hours per diem.

Harvard Register, 1827-28, p. 303.

To dig out, to decamp or abscond suddenly: as, the defaulter stole a horse, and dug out. [Slang, U. S.]

II. trans. 1. To excavate; make a passage through or into, or remove, by loosening and taking away material: usually followed by an adverb: as, to dig up the ground; to dig out a choked tunnel.

Who digs hills because they do aspire,
Throws down one mountain to cast up a higher.

Shak., Pericles, I. 4.

2. To form by excavation; make by digging: as, to dig a tunnel, a well, a mine, etc.; to dig one's way out.

Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein. Prov. xvi. 27.

I believe more Men do dig their Graves with their Teeth than with the Tankard.

Hewell, Letters, II. 3.

3. To break up and turn over piecemeal, as a portion of ground: as, to dig a garden with a spade; a hog digs the ground with his snout.

Dikera and delveres digged (var. dikeden (A), vi. 100) up the balks.

Piers Plowman (B), vi. 108.

4. To excavate a passage or tunnel for; make a way of escape for by digging: as, he dug himself out of prison.

Look you, th' anniversary . . . is digged himself four yards under the countermeins.

Shak., Hen. V., III. 2.

5. To obtain or remove by excavation; figuratively, to find or discover by effort or search; get by close attention or investigation: often followed by up or out: as, to dig potatoes; to dig or dig out ore; to dig up old records; to dig out a lesson.

There let Julianus Apostata diggen him [John the Baptist] up, and let breunen [burn] his bones.

Manderley, Travels, p. 107.

As appeareth by the coyces of the Tyrans and Sidonians, which are digged out and found daily.

Perthes, Piramides, p. 66.

6. To cause to penetrate; thrust or force in: followed by into: as, he dug his spurs into his horse's flanks; he dug his heel into the ground.—To dig down, to undermine and cause to fall by digging.

In their selfwill they digged down a wall. Gen. xix. 2.

To dig in, to cover or incorporate by digging: as, to dig in manure.—To dig over, to examine or search by digging: as, he dug over the spot very carefully, but found nothing.

dig (dig), n. [dig, v.] 1. A thrust; a punch; a poke: as, a dig in the ribs: often used figuratively of sarcasm and criticism.—2. A diligent or plodding student. [Students' slang, U. S.]

The many honest dig who had in this room consumed the midnight oil.

Collegian, p. 281.

digamist (di-gai'mist), n. [di-gai'mist,] Used only in the following phrase.—Digamist add, same as tanist add (which see, under tanist).

digamist (dig'g-mist), n. [digamy + -ist.] One who has been married twice; a widower or widow who marries a second time. See digamist. [Rare.]

Digamists, according to Origen, are saved in the name of Christ, but are by no means crowned by him.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 344.

digamma (di-gam'g), n. [L. digamma, also digammon, digammos, < Gr. dygamos, also dygamon, dygamos, the digamma, a name first found in the grammarians of the first century (so called because its form, F, resembles two gammas, Γ, set one above the other); < dy, two-, twice-, + gamma, gamma.] A letter corresponding in derivation and alphabetic place to the Latin and modern European F, once belonging to the Greek alphabet, and retained longest among the Æolians. It was a consonant, and appears to have had the force of the English w. It went out of use with the disappearance of the sound signified by it from Greek pronunciation, but is restorable on metrical and other evidence in many ancient Greek words, especially in Homer.

digammated (di-gam'g-ted), a. [digamma + -ate + -ed.] 1. Formed or spelled with a digamma; using a digamma.

It is more than forty years since Richard Payne Knight published in 1830 his famous digammated Iliad—or rather Villiad—of Homer.

J. Hadley, Essays, p. 54.

To the digammated and older form of the Greek oblique cases there corresponds also the Latin Jovem, Jovis, Jovi.

Grimm, Teut. Mythol. (trans.), I. 159.

2. Formed as if with a digamma: as, the digammated cross, a phallic symbol.

digamous (dig'g-mus), a. [L.L. digamus, < Gr. dygamos, married a second time, < dy, two-, + gamma, marriage.] 1. Relating to digamy, or a second marriage.—2. In bot., same as androgynous. [Rare.]

digamy (dig'g-mi), n. [Gr. as if **dygama*, < dygamos; see digamous.] Second marriage; marriage after the death of the first spouse. [Rare.]

Digamy, or second marriage, is described by Athanasius as "a decent adultery." Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 345.

digastric (di-gas'trik), a. and n. [= F. digastrique = Pg. It. digastrico, < N.L. digastricus, < Gr. dy, two-, + gastro, belly.] I. a. In anat.:

(a) Having two fleshy bellies with an intervening tendinous part, as a muscle: as, the omohyoid, the biverter cervicis, etc., are digastric muscles. (b) Pertaining to the digastric.—Digastric fossa. (a) A shallow depression on the inner surface of the inferior border of the lower jaw, on either side of the symphysis. (b) The digastric groove.—Digastric groove, the depression on the inner side of the mastoid process of the temporal bone.—Digastric lobe of the cerebellum. See cerebellum.—Digastric muscle. See muscle.—Digastric nerve, a branch of the facial nerve, supplying the posterior belly of the digastric muscle.

II. n. A muscle of the lower jaw: so called because in man it has two bellies. In its general condition it is a principal depressor of the lower jaw, opening the mouth and antagonizing the temporal and masseteric muscles. It arises from the back part of the skull, and is inserted into the mandible. In man and many other animals (though not in most) it becomes digastric or double-bellied, the intervening tendon being bound by an aponeurotic loop to the hyoid bone, and the muscle thus becoming an elevator of the hyoid as well as a depressor of the jaw. It arises from the digastric groove of the mastoid, and is inserted into the symphysis menti. With the lower border of the jaw its two bellies, which meet at an angle, bound the surgical triangle of the neck known as the submaxillary space.

digastricus (di-gas'trik-us), n.; pl. digastrici (-i). [NL.; see digastric.] In anat., the digastric muscle.

digby (dig'bi), n.; pl. digbies (-bis). A smoked herring exported from the town of Digby in Nova Scotia; a Digby herring.

Digenes (di-jen'g-j), n. [NL., fem. of **digenes*, < Gr. dygait, of two kinds or sexes: see digenous.] A genus of Asiatic flycatchers, of the family Muscopidae, related to Niltava. D. superciliosus of India is an example. Hodgson, 1844.

Digenes (di-jen'g-j), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of **digenous*; see Digenes.] A division of trematode worms or flukes, containing those which leave the egg as free ciliated organisms: opposed to Monogenes.

digenous (di-jen'g-us), a. [*N.L. *digenous*; see Digenes.] Having the characters of the Digenes; pertaining to the Digenes: as, a digenous fluke.

digonous (di-jen'g-us), a. [NL., < Gr. dy, two-, + gonos, generation.] In bot., successive generation by two different processes, as sexual chiefly upon roots dug from the ground. Collectively called Digger Indians.

Among all these Indians the most miserable are the root-diggers, who live almost entirely on the scanty roots of plants which are found in the ravines or plains. These poor wretches suffer all the hardships of hunger and want. They are compelled to spend two thirds of the year among the mountains, with no other resource than a little fish and roots. When both these provisions fail, it is impossible to picture the wretched state of these pariahs of the wilderness. Yet they are not downcast; they are ever cheerful, and endure their suffering with dignity. They are open and sociable with strangers and perfectly honest in their transactions.

Abel Domenech, Deserts of North America (trans.), II. 60. S. pl. In entom., specifically, the hymenopterous insects called digger-wasps or Fossorae. See Fossorae and digger-wasp.

digger-wasp (dig'-er-wasp), n. The popular name of the fossorial hymenopterous insects of the families Scelidae, Pompilidae, and Sphogidae, most of which dig burrows in the ground, in which they lay their eggs, provisioning each cell with the bodies of other insects, on which their larvae feed after hatching. Sphex ichneumonoides is a large rust-colored species which digs holes six inches deep and provisions them with grasshoppers; Chlorion carinatum provisions the nest with spiders, and Ammodiplosis pictipennis with cutworms. See also cut under Ammodiplosis.

digging (dig'-ing), n. [Verbal n. of dig, v.] 1. The act of excavating, especially with spade or shovel, or, in general, with simple tools and without the aid of blasting. Excavation in this general sense receives various names, according to the nature and object of the work done. See excavation, mine, and quarry.

2. The act of undermining; plotting; maneuvering.

Let us not project long designs, crafty plots, and diggings so deep that the intrigues of a design shall never be unfolded till our grand-children have forgotten our virtues or our vices. Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, l. 2 (Ord MS.).

3. pl. That which is dug out.

He shall have the seasonable loppings; so he shall have seasonable diggings of an open mine.

Bacon, Impeachment of Waste.

4. pl. A region or locality where mining is carried on. [Western U. S. and Australia.] Hence—5. pl. Region; place; locality: as, business is dull in these diggings. [Colloq., western U. S.]

She won't be taken with a cold chill when she realizes what is being done in these diggings?

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, xxi.

Dry diggings, placer mines at a distance from water, or where water cannot be conveniently got for washing the material excavated.

digging-machine (dig'-ing-ma-shen'), n. A machine for spading or breaking up the ground. It employs either a gang of spade-like tools that are thrust into the ground and then withdrawn with a twisting motion, or a wheel armed with shares like a plowshare, which are thrust into the ground as the wheel is revolved by the forward motion of the machine.

digit (dit), v. t.; pret. and pp. digit. [ME. digiten, digiten, digiton (later sometimes without the guttural, dyten, etc.), < AS. dīktan (pret. dikite, pp. ge-dikite), set in order, arrange, direct, dispose, prescribe, = D. dīchten = OHG. dīhten, MHG. G. dichten, invent, write verses, = Isol. dīhta, compose in Latin, romance, lie, = Sw. dīhta, feign, fable, = Dan. digte, invent, romance, write verses, < L. dīctare, repeat, pronounce, dictate for writing, compose, order, prescribe, dictate: see dictate, v.] 1. Lord Randal (A) (Child's Ballads, II. 23).

digiter (diht'er), n. A person who digits or dresses wood or stone, or winnows grain. [Scotch.]

digitings (diht'ingz), n. pl. [< digit, v.] Refuse. [Scotch.] Also spelled dihtings.

For had my father sought the world round,

Till he the very digitings o' had found,

An odder hag cou'd not come in his way.

Ross, Balaena, p. 25.

digitly (dit'li), adv. [< digit, pp., + -ly.]

Handsomely: as, "houses digitly furnished,"

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 27.

digit (dit'it), n. [< L. digitus, a finger, a toe, a finger's breadth, perhaps orig. **deotus* = Gr. daktyl-os, a finger, a toe (whence ult. E. dactyl, q. v.), prob. akin to dēxōda, dial. dēxōda, take, catch, receive; cf. E. finger, similarly related to fang, take, catch. Prob. not, as generally supposed, cognate with E. toe, q. v. The Teut. word never means 'finger,' and the human toes are not used, normally, to 'take' or 'catch' anything.] 1. A finger or toe; in the plural, the third segment of the hand (manus) or foot (pes), consisting of the fingers or toes, each of which has usually three, sometimes two, occasionally one, and rarely more than three, joints or phalanges. In anatomy and zoology the term is generic, covering all the modifications of a hand or foot beyond the metacarpus or metatarsus. The digits are specified by qualifying terms: as, the index digit, the forefinger; the middle digit, etc. The inner digits of the hand and foot, respectively, when there are five, as in man, are the thumb and great toe, or the pollex and hallux. See cuts under foot and hand. In common use digit is applied only to a finger.

2. A fingerbreadth; a dactyl; one fourth of a palm: a measure of length. The Roman digit was 12.5 millimeters or 0.75 of an English inch. See dactyl and fingerbreadth.—3. In astron., the twelfth part of the diameter of the sun or moon: used in expressing the quantity of an eclipse: as, an eclipse of six digits (one which hides one half of the diameter).—4. One of the first nine numbers, indicated by the fingers in counting on them; also, one of the nine Arabic numerals, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.

Any number which can be written with one figure only is named a digit; and therefore 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 are only digits and all the digits that are.

T. Hult, Arithmetica (1800), fol. 7 b.

digit (dij'it), v. t. [< digit, n.; in allusion to the L. phrase digitis monstrari (or demonstrari), be pointed out with the finger, i. e., be distinguished, be famous.] To point at or out with the finger.

I shall never care to be digit with a "That is he."

Fitzham, Resolves, l. 23.

digital (dij'i-tal), a. and n. [= F. Sp. Pg. digitalis = it. digitale, < L. digitalis, < digitus, a finger; see digit.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a digit or digits: as, the digital phalanges.—2. Resembling digits; digitate.—Digital cavity, in anat., the posterior cornu of the lateral ventricle of the brain.—Digital fossa, in anat., a pit on the greater trochanter of the thighbone, where five muscles (the pyramidal, the obturator externus and internus, and the two gemelli) are inserted together. The depression is about large enough to admit the end of one's finger.—Digital impressions, in anat., the slight depressions on the inner surface of the cranial bones, which correspond to the cerebral convolutions.—Digital sheaths, in anat., the sheaths of the flexor tendons of the digits.

II. n. 1. A digit; a finger or toe. [Rare.]

Beauish brigands who wear . . . paste rings upon unwashed digitals. Bulwer, What will he do with it? iv. 9.

2. The fifth and last joint of the pedipalp of a spider. It is generally larger than the preceding joints, sometimes much swollen, and in the males modified to form the complicated sexual or palpal organs.

3. One of the keys or finger-levers of instruments of the organ or piano class.

digitalis (dij-i-tā'is), n. [NL., < Digitalis, q. v.] Same as digitalin.

digitalic (dij-i-tal'ik), a. [< NL. Digitalis + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or derived from plants of the genus Digitalis: as, digitalic acid.

digitalin, digitaline (dij-i-tal-in), n. [< NL. Digitalis + -in, -ine.] The substance or substances isolated from the leaves of Digitalis purpurea as its active principle. There seem to be several different kinds, some crystalline and some amorphous, some soluble and some insoluble in water; and there is reason to think that each of these, even the crystalline, consists of a mixture of several things. They all have properties similar in varying degrees to those of the crude drug. Also digitalins.

Digitalina (dij-i-tā'i-nā), n. [NL. (Bory, 1824), < L. Digitalis, digital, + -ina.] A genus of peritrichous ciliate infusorians, referred to the family Vorticellidae. They commonly grow on the back of the minute crustaceous animals which live in fresh water, as the common water-flies, etc., covering them so completely as to make it difficult for them to swim about.

Digitalis (dij-i-tā'is), n. [NL., < L. digitalis, pertaining to the fingers (see digit): so named by Fuchs (A. D. 1543), after the G. name finger-hat (lit. 'finger-hat,' i. e., thimble); cf. the E. names foegloves, foe-fingers, ladies-fingers, dead-men's-bells, etc., F. gants de Notre Dame (Our Lady's gloves), doigts de la Vierge (the Virgin's fingers), etc. The allusion is to the pendulous, finger-like flowers. See foegloves.] A genus of plants, natural order Scrophulariaceae, containing about 20 species of tall herbs, natives of Europe and western Asia. The foegloves, D. purpurea, the handsomest of the genus, bearing a tall raceme of large, drooping, bell-shaped flowers, is common in cultivation. It is used in medicine to increase vasomotor tone, raise the blood-tension, favor diuresis, and improve the nutrition of the heart.

Digitalaria (dij-i-tā'ri-a), n. [NL., < L. Digitalis, finger: see digit.] A genus of grasses with digitate spikes, now referred to Pentstemon.

Digitalis (Digitalis purpurea).

digitate (dij'i-tāt), a. [L. digitatus, having fingers or toes, < digitus, finger: see digit.] 1. In bot., having deep radiating divisions, like fingers: applied to leaves and roots. By later botanists it is restricted chiefly to compound leaves with leaflets borne at the apex of the petiole. 2. In zoöl., characterized by digitation; having or consisting of a set of processes like digits. Also digitated.—Digitate thistle, in entom., those thistles in which the exterior edge, near the apex, has several long, finger-like projections, as in a mole-cricket.—Digitate wings, in entom., those wings which have deep incisions extending from the margin, between the veins or nervures, toward the base, as in many Pteroporidae: each division of such wings is called a radix.

Digitate Leaf.

digitate (dij'i-tāt), v. t. [L. digitus, finger: see digit.] To point out, as if with a finger. The resting on water, without motion, doth digitate a reason. J. Robinson, Indoxa, p. 63.

digitated (dij'i-tāt-ed), a. Same as digitate, 2. Animals multitudes, or such as are digitated, or have several divisions in their foot. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 4.

digitately (dij'i-tāt-ly), adv. In a digitate manner.—Digitately pinnate, in bot., applied to digitate leaves of which the leaflets are pinnate.

digitiform (dij'i-ti-fōrm), a. [L. digitus, finger, + forma, shape.] Digital in form; digitate; finger-like; disposed like a set of fingers. Digitigrade (dij-i-tig'grād), a. [NL., neut. pl. of digitigradus: see digitigrade.] In Cuvier's system (1817), the second tribe of his third family Carnivora, "the members of which walk on the ends of their toes": distinguished from Plantigrade, etc. The division contained the cat and dog families and some others. It was to some extent natural, and the distinction implied is obvious; but the word is not in use, except as a convenient collective or descriptive term, the several families of carnivorous quadrupeds being now otherwise arranged in superfamily groups.

digitigrade (dij'i-ti-grād), a. and a. [NL., digitigradus, walking on the toes, < L. digitus, finger, toe, + grad, walk: see grade.] 1. a. 1. Walking on the toes, with the heel raised from the ground; not stepping on the whole sole of the foot: applied chiefly to carnivorous quadrupeds, and opposed to plantigrade, but without special reference to the Digitigrade as framed by Cuvier. Most quadrupeds are digitigrade. Specifically—2. Of or pertaining to the Digitigrade; having the characters of the Digitigrade.

II. a. One of the Digitigrade. Digitigradism (dij'i-ti-grād-izm), a. [Digitigrade + -ism.] The character of being digitigrade; a walking or the capability of walking on the digits without putting the whole foot to the ground.

In some Ameiura batrachia there is a partial digitigradism. E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 354. Digitinerved (dij'i-ti-nērvd), a. [L. digitus, finger, + nervus, nerve, + -ed.] In bot., having the ribs of the leaf radiating from the top of the petiole. Digitine (dij'i-tis), v. t. [Digit + -ine.] To finger; handle. None but the devil, besides yourself, could have digitine a pen after so scurrilous a manner. Tom Swann, Works, II. 111.

Digitonin (dij-i-tō-nin), a. [pl. digitonin (-i)]. [NL., < L. digitus, finger: see digit.] A small portable instrument used for giving strength and flexibility to the fingers in piano-playing.

Digitigrade—Hind Leg of Lion. a., humer or thigh; b., tibia or leg; c., tarsus and metatarsus, or foot exclusive of toes; d., calc. or heel; e., phalanx, or sole of foot; f., digit or toe.

It is shaped like a distinctive piano, and has a keyboard with five keywheels on strong metal springs. Also called digit piano.

digitoxin (dij-i-tōk'sin), a. [NL., Digit (take) + L. tox (toxin), poison, + -in.] A poisonous principle obtained from Digitaria in the form of yellowish crystals soluble in alcohol. In alcoholic solution it is decomposed by dilute acids, yielding toxicin, an uncrystallizable and extremely poisonous substance.

digitule (dij'i-tūl), a. [F. digitule, < L. digitulus, a little finger, toe, claw, dim. of digitus, a finger: see digit.] 1. A little finger or toe; a small digit.—2. A minute process of the tarsal claws of some insects. Digitules are especially notable in the Oecidae or scale-insects, where they take the form of knobbed or pointed, brittle-like, movable organs arising near the base of the tarsal claw.

digitus (dij'i-tus), a.; pl. digiti (-i). [L.: see digit.] 1. In anat., a digit; a finger or toe; specifically, a digit of the fore limb, or a finger, as distinguished from daquy, a toe. Wilder and Gage. [Rare].—2. In entom., one of the joints of the tarsus exclusive of the basal joint, which is called the metatarsus, palmus, or planta: used in describing bees. Some writers use the term collectively for all the joints after the metatarsus. Kirby and Spence. See daquy (b).

digitator (dij-i-gi-tāt-ōr), v. t. [L. digitator, pp. of digitari, fight for life or death, contend warmly, < di- for dis, apart, + gladiari, fight with a sword (see gladiator), < gladius, a sword.] To fence; quarrel. Hales.

digitation (dij-i-gi-tā-shun), a. [ML., digitatio (n) in digitatio lingua, a biting remark, < L. digitari, pp. digitatus, contend: see gladiari.] A combat with swords; hence, a contest of any kind; a quarrel; a dispute; a disputation. [Rare.] Their fence player, or digitations of naked men. Pattinson, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 29.

They [schoolmen] see such digitation about subtilties and matters of no use. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 46.

Avoid all digitations, facility of credit, or superstitious simplicity; seek the consonancy and concatenation of truth. B. Jenson, Discoveries.

Diglossa (di-glos'sa), a. [NL. (Wagler, 1832), < Gr. dyglossos (speaking two languages), having two tongues (a split tongue): see diglot.] 1. A genus of tenebrous oscine passerine birds, or honey-creeper, of the American family Certhiidae or Dacnidiidae. They have a very acute curved bill fleshy serrate along a part of the gitting edge, and the tongue bifid, whence the name. There are about 13 species, inhabiting the warm parts of continental America, such as D. bartholemia, D. carolinensis, D. magisterialis, D. peruviana, and D. hyemalis, respectively representing five sections of the genus. D. peruviana is a very rare species from Peru, lately described. 2. In entom., a genus of brachelytrous Coleoptera or rove-beetles, of the family Staphylinidae.

Diglossini (di-glo-si-nē), a. [NL., < Diglossa + -ina.] A subfamily of Certhiidae, represented by the genera Diglossa and Diglossopsis, having the bill hooked.

diglot, diglott (di'glot), a. [Gr. dyglossos, speaking two languages, < dy-, two, + glossa, tongue, language.] Using, speaking, or written in two languages.

The first enterprise of this kind (a book containing parallel versions of the same text in several different languages) is the famous Hexapla of Origen; but here only Hebrew and Greek were employed, . . . so that the work was rather diglott than polyglott in the usual sense. Smith, Bible Dict., III. 1587.

diglottis (di-glōt'ik), a. [As diglott + -is.] Same as diglot.

The conquests of Alexander and of Rome had made men diglottis to an extent which has no parallel in history. W. Smith, Bible Dict., III. 1587.

diglossin (di-glo-si-nē), a. [NL., < Diglossa + -ina.] A subfamily of Certhiidae, represented by the genera Diglossa and Diglossopsis, having the bill hooked.

diglot, diglott (di'glot), a. [Gr. dyglossos, speaking two languages, < dy-, two, + glossa, tongue, language.] Using, speaking, or written in two languages.

The first enterprise of this kind (a book containing parallel versions of the same text in several different languages) is the famous Hexapla of Origen; but here only Hebrew and Greek were employed, . . . so that the work was rather diglott than polyglott in the usual sense. Smith, Bible Dict., III. 1587.

diglottis (di-glōt'ik), a. [As diglott + -is.] Same as diglot.

Pg. dignificar* = It. dignificare, < ML. dignificare, think worthy, lit. make worthy, < L. dignus, worthy, + facere, make.] 1. To invest with honor or dignity; exalt in rank or office; promote.

Treasons and guilty men are made in states, Too oft, to dignify the magistrates. R. Jonson, Catiline, III. 1.

They [tyrants] were set up thus to be deluded, rather than dignified. W. Montague, Devout Essays, II. iv. § 2.

2. To confer honor upon; make illustrious; give celebrity to; honor.

Your worth will dignify our feast. R. Jonson.

Thou didst dignify our fathers days with many revelations above all the fore-going ages since thou tocht the flesh. Milton, On Def. of Humbl. Remonstr.

That luxury of wandering thought which one is apt to dignify with the name of reflection. Irring, Sketch-Book, p. 122.

3. To make worthy of admiration and respect; elevate.

He shines in the council by a natural eloquence; and he would write as well as he speaks, in order to dignify his style, he did not affect expressions which render it stiff and obscure. Smollett, tr. of Gil Blas, xi. 5.

—Fig. 1. To prefer, advance.—2. To grace, adorn, ennoble, lend or give luster to.

dignitary (dig-ni-tā-ri), a.; pl. dignitaries (-ri). [F. dignitaire = It. dignitario, < ML. as if **dignitarius*, irreg. < L. dignitas (-t), dignity, rank, office: see dignify.] One who holds an exalted rank or office; especially, an ecclesiastic who ranks higher than a priest or canon.

Only about one hundred dignitaries and eight parochial priests resigned their benefices, or were deprived. Hallam, Const. Hist., I. 111.

Dignitary benediction. See benedicere, 2.

dignity (dig-ni-ti), a.; pl. dignities (-tiz). [ML. dignitas, dignetate, dignetas, < OF. dignite, dignitatis, F. dignitatis = Fr. dignitas = Sp. dignidad = Pg. dignidade = It. dignità, dignità, < L. dignitas (-i-s), worthiness, merit, dignity, grandeur, authority, rank, office, < dignus, worthy, prob. akin to decus, honor, esteem (whence ult. E. decorate, decorous, decorum, etc.), and decere, become (whence ult. E. decent, q. v.). Dignity is a doublet of dainty, q. v. 1. The state of being worthy; nobleness or elevation of mind; worthiness: as, dignity of sentiments.

True dignity abides with her alone
Who, in the silent hour of inward thought,
Can still respect, can still reverse herself,
In lowliness of heart. Wordsworth.

2. Elevation; honorable place or elevated rank; degree of excellence, either in estimation or in the order of nature: as, man is superior in dignity to brutes.

And there is a decency, that every speech should be to the appetite and delight or dignity of the hearer. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 222.

Whatever has a value can be replaced by something else which is equivalent; whatever, on the other hand, is above all value, and therefore admits of no equivalent, has a dignity. Kant, cr. by Abbott.

3. Elevation and repose of aspect or of deportment; nobility of mien: as, a man of native dignity; "dignity of attitude," J. Caird.

Grace was in all her steps, heaven in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.

Milton, P. L., viii. 489.

Another mechanical method of making great men, and adding dignity to kings and queens, is to accompany them with halberds and battle axes. Addison, Spectator, No. 42.

4. Height; importance; rank.

Small habits well pursued betimes
May reach the dignity of crimes.

Mrs. H. More, Florida, i.

Even in treason there is sometimes a dignity. It is by possibility a bold act, a perilous act.

De Quincey, Emerson, ii. 87.

5. An elevated office, civil or ecclesiastical; hereditary rank or title, or official distinction.

The Pope spared not to threaten Excommunication to X. Henry himself, if he restored not Becket to his Dignity. Baker, Chronicles, p. 57.

He (Frederic I. of Prussia) succeeded in gaining the great object of his life, the title of King. In the year 1700 he assumed this new dignity. Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

In vain the Protestant bishops pleaded in the House of Lords that their position was intolerable and their dignity a mere mockery.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 322.

6. The rank or title of a nobleman; the right to use a title of honor, originally in virtue of an estate and accompanied by an official function.

All were surprised to see so many new faces in the most eminent dignities. Addison, Vision of Justice.

7. One who holds high rank; a dignitary.

These filthy dreamers . . . speak evil of dignities.

Jude 8.

8. Any honor conferred; promotion.

For those (honors) of old,
And the late dignities heap'd up to them,
We rest your hermits. Shak., Macbeth, i. 6

9. In rhet., avoidance of unseemly or trivial tropes and figures.—10. In astrol., a situation in which a planet has an influence more powerful than usual.

The lord of the ascendant say that he is fortunat, when he is in god place for the ascendant as in angle; or in a succedent, where-as he is in dignity & comforted with friendly aspects of planetes & reserved.

Chaucer, Astrolobe, ii. § 4.

11. A self-evident truth; an axiom. This word is one of the fantastical learned fabrications with which some old writers ornament their pages. It is a Latin imitation of the Greek ἀξιώματα, which means both axiom and dignity in the sense of worth.

These sciences [mathematics], concluding from dignities and principles known by themselves, receive not satisfaction from probable reasons, much less from bare and presumptuous asseverations. Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., i. 7.

Accidental dignity, in astrol., the situation of a planet in a good aspect as to light, motion, etc.—Cap of dignity. Same as cap of maintenance (which see, under maintenance).—Essential dignity, in astrol., the situation of a planet in a favorable part of the zodiac.—Sign. 2. Station, standing, eminence, loftiness, exaltation, greatness.—3. Majesty, statelyness, gravity.

dignotus (di-gnō'tus), n. [L. dignotus, pp. of dignoscere, usually dignoscere, know apart, distinguishing, < di-, dis-, apart, + gnosco, nosco, know, = E. know.] Distinguishing mark; sign.

That (temperamental) dignotions, and conjecture of prevalent humours, may be collected from spots in our nails, we are not averse to concede.

Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., v. 22.

digonentic (di-gō-nē'tik), n. [L. digonētic, pp. of digonētic, beget (< γίνομαι, offspring, race, stock), + -ic.] In entom., double-brooded; having two broods during a single year.

digoneticum (di-gō-nē'tikum), n. [L. digonēticum + -ism.] In entom., the state or quality of being digonetic or double-brooded.

Digonopora (di-gō-nop'ō-rā), n. pl. [NL. neut. pl. of digonoporus; see digonoporus.] A division of dendrocoelous turbellarian worms, having separate genital pores: opposed to Monogonopora. It contains the marine planarians of such genera as Stylochus, Leptoplana, and Eurylepta.

digonoporous (di-gō-nop'ō-rus), a. [L. digonoporus, < Gr. di-, two-, + γόνος (< γ, 'yes, produce) + πόρος, passage.]] Having separate genital pores, as a planarian; specifically, of or pertaining to the Digonopora: opposed to monogonoporous.

digonous (di-gō-nus or di-gō-nus), a. [= F. digone, < Gr. di-, two-, + γωνία, angle.]] In bot., having two angles: as, a digonous stem.

di grado (dē grā'do), [It., step by step, lit. from step: di, < L. de, from; grado, < L. gradus, step: see grade.] In music, moving by conjunct degrees.

diagram (di'gram), n. [= F. diagramme, < Gr. di-, two-, + γράμμα, a thing written, < γράφειν, write.]] Same as diagraph.

diagraph (di'graf), n. and a. [L. di-, two-, + γράφειν, write.]] 1. n. Two letters used to represent one sound, as ea in head, th in path.

All improper diphthongs, or, as I have called them, di-graphs, are changed into the single vowels which they stand for. T. Sheridan.

There are five elementary consonants represented by di-graphs: th (thin), th = dh (thine, then), sh (she), zh (azure), ng (king). Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., VIII.

II. a. Consisting of two letters used to represent one sound: as, diagraph signs; diagraph consonants.

diagraphic (di-graf'ik), a. [L. diagraph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to, or of the nature of, a diagraph.

digress (di- or di-gres'), v. i. [L. digressus, pp. of digredi, go apart, step aside, < di- for dis-, apart, + gradi, go, step: see grade. Cf. aggress, congress, egress, ingress, progress, regress.] 1. To turn aside from the direct or appointed course; deviate or wander away, as from the main road, from the main tenor and purpose in speaking or writing, or from the principal line of argument, study, or occupation.

I have digressed, because of the extreme prejudice which both religion and philosophy have received and may receive by being commixed together.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 154.

I will a little digress from my main discourse of Padua, and . . . speak something of him.

Coryat, Cruetiana, i. 155.

In the pursuit of an argument there is hardly room to digress into a particular definition, as often as a man varies the signification of any term.

Locke.

Let the student of our history digress into whatever other fields he will.

J. Stephens.

2. To turn aside from the right path; transgress; offend. [Rare.]

Thy abundant goodness shall excuse

This deadly blot in thy digressing son.

Shak., Rich. II., v. 2.

digress (di- or di-gres'), n. [L. digressus, n., a going apart, < digredi, pp. digressus, go apart: see digress, v.] A digression.

A digress from my history. Fuller, Ch. Hist., xi. 2. 42.

digression (di- or di-gres'hun), n. [L. digression = OF. digression, F. digression = Fr. digressio = Sp. digression = Pg. digressão = It. digressione, < L. digressio (n.), < digredi, pp. digressus, go apart: see digress, v.] 1. The act of digressing; deviation from a regular or appointed course; especially, a departure from the main subject under consideration; an excursion of speech or writing.

But what? Methinks I deserve to be pounded for straying from poetry to oratory: but both have such an affinity in the worldish considerations, that I think this digression will make my meaning receive the fuller understanding.

Sir P. Sidney, Def. of Poesie (ed. 1610), p. 97.

Digressions in a book are like foreign troops in a state, which argue the nation to want a heart and hands of its own.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, vii.

2. Deviation from the path of virtue; transgression. [Rare.]

Then my digression is so vile, no base,
That it will live engraven in my face.

Shak., Lucius, i. 202.

3. In astrol., the angular distance in the ecliptic of the inferior planets Mercury and Venus from the sun.

digressional (di- or di-gres'hun-al), a. [L. digression + -al.] Pertaining to or consisting in digression; departing from the main purpose or subject.

Milton has judiciously avoided Fletcher's digressive ornaments. F. Warren, Notes on Milton's Juvenile Poems.

In particular, the action of episodes, or digressive narratives, interwoven with the principal narrative, was entirely Aristotelian.

De Quincey, Hamlet, i.

digressive (di- or di-gres'iv), a. [= F. digressif = Sp. digresivo = Pg. It. digressivo, < L. digressivus, < L. digressus, pp. of digredi, digress: see digress, v.] Tending to digress; departing from the main subject; partaking of the nature of digression.

The wild diffusion of the sentiments, and the digressive sallies of imagination, would have been compressed and restrained by confinement of rhyme. Johnson, Young.

digressively (di- or di-gres'iv-ly), adv. By way of digression.

digyn (di'jin), n. [*NL. *digynus*, < Gr. di-, two-, + γυνή, woman (mod. bot. pistil).] A plant having two pistils.

Digynia (di-jin'i-ā), n. pl. [NL., < **digynus*: see digyn, digynous.] The name given by Linnaeus, in his artificial system, to such plants as have two styles, or a single style deeply cleft into two parts, forming the second order in each of his first thirteen classes.

digynian (di-jin'i-an), a. [As Digynia + -an.] Having two pistils.

digynous (di-jin'us), a. [*NL. *digynus*: see digyn.] Same as digynian.

dihedral (di-hē'dral), a. [Also diedral; < di-hedron + -al.] Having two sides, as a figure; having two plane faces, as a crystal.—Dihedral angle, the mutual inclination of two intersecting planes, or the angular space included between them, as the angles between the two planes ABD and ABC.

Dihedral Angle.

dihedron (di-hē'dron), n. [Gr. di-, two-, + ἑδρα, a seat, base; cf. diēdra, a seat for two persons.]] A figure with two sides or surfaces.

dihelios, dihelium (di-hē'li-os, -um), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, through, + ἥλιος, sun.]] That chord of the elliptic orbit of a planet which passes through the focus where the sun is and is perpendicular to the transverse axis. Also dihely.

dihely (di-hē'li), n. [= F. dihélie, < NL. dihelios, dihelium: see dihelios.] Same as dihelios.

dihexagonal (di-hek-sag'ō-nal), a. [L. di- + hexagonal.] Twelve-sided: as, a dihexagonal prism or pyramid: also used to describe a double six-sided pyramid or quartzoid.

dihexahedral (di-hek-sag'hē'dral), a. [L. di- + hexahedral.] In crystal, having the form of a hexahedral or six-sided prism with trihedral summits.

dihexahedron (di-hek-sag'hē'dron), n.; pl. dihexahedra, dihexahedra (-drons, -dra). [Gr. di-, two-, + ἑξ, = E. six, + ἑδρα, a seat, base: see di- and hexahedron.] In crystal, a six-sided prism with trihedral summits.

Dihexahedra of quartz, and various rare minerals are noted in them.

Amer. Naturalist, XXII. 247.

dihydrate (di-hi'drit), n. [Gr. di-, two-, + ὑδρ (-ōp), water, + -ia.] A phosphate of copper containing two equivalents of water. It is found in small green monoclinic crystals.

diamab, diamabus (di-lamb', -am'bus), n.; pl. diamabe, diamabi (-amb'e, -bi). [L. diamabus, < Gr. διαμῆτορ, < di-, two-, + μῆτορ, lambus.]] In anc. pros., two lambi, or an lambic dipody regarded as a single compound foot. The name diamabus, strictly belonging to the lambic dipody in its normal form (— — —), can be extended to its epirritic variety also (— — —).

Dipolia, Dipolia (di-pō'li-ā, di-pol'i-ā), n. pl. [Gr. Διπόλια or Διπόλια, contr. of Διπόλιος or Διπόλιος, n. ut. pl. prop. adj., < Δι (gen. Δις, dat. Δι), Zeus, + πόλις, guardian of the city, an epithet of Zeus, < πόλις, city.]] An ancient Athenian festival celebrated annually, with sacrifice of an ox, on the 14th of Ektroporion (about the end of June), on the Acropolis, in honor of Zeus Polieus—that is, Protector of the City. Also called Βουπολῖα.

dijudicant (di-jō'di-kant), n. [L. dijudicans (-t), pp. of dijudicare, decide: see dijudicate.] One who adjudicates, determines, or decides.

And if great philosophers doubt of many things which popular dijudicants hold as certain in their creed, I suppose ignorance itself will not say it is because they are more ignorant. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, 1211.

dijudicate (di-jō'di-kāt), v. [L. dijudicare, pp. of dijudicare, decide, determine, distinguish between, < di-, dis-, apart, + judicare, judge: see judicate, judge.] 1. trans. To judge; determine:

The Church of Rome, when she commands, she is the authority of the Church in discrediting of heretics, means only to speak of heretics.

Hale, Golden Remains, p. 280.

II. trans. To determine; decide.

That is a lawful Council with which, while acting as Clerical, the whole Church communicates, and the matter being determined, holds it to be adhered to.

Quoted in Fussy's Stratford, p. 28.

determination (di-jō-di-kā'shon), n. [L. determinatio (n.), < determinare, pp. determinatus, decide: see determine.] Judicial distinction.

It cannot be otherwise but that the love of ourselves should strongly incline us in our most abstracted determination.

Glennville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xiii.

dike-bread (dik'k-bred), n. [< dike, native name, + E. bread.] A fatty substance resembling chocolate, prepared from the almond-like kernel of the fruit of the Mangifera Gabonensis, used as food by the natives of the west coast of Africa, from Sierra Leone to the Gaboon. Watts, Diet. of Chem.

dika-fat (dik'k-fat), n. Same as dika-bread. dikamall (dik-a-mal'), n. [E. Ind.] The native name of a resinous gum which exudes from the ends of young shoots of Gardenia lucida, a rubiaceous shrub of India. It has a strong, peculiar, and offensive odor, and is useful in the treatment of sores and cutaneous diseases. In India it is employed as a remedy for dyspepsia. Also deumale.

dikast, n. See dicaet.

dike (dik), n. [Also spelled, less correctly, dyke; < ME. dike, dyke, dike (also assimilated diche, dyche, dyck, dyck, mod. E. ditch), < AS. dic, m., f., a ditch, channel, dike, wall, = OS. dīk, m., a fish-pond, = OFries. dīk, m., a bank, dam, = D. dijk, m., a bank, dam, = MLG. dīk, LG. dijk, m., a pond, usually a bank, dam, = MHG. nīck, dijk, m., a ditch, canal, pond, fish-pond, marsh, G. teich, m., a pond, fish-pond, tank, dike, m., a bank, dam (this sense and form, with initial d for t, after LG. and D.) = Icel. dīk, neut., dīki, m., a ditch, = Norw. dike, neut., a ditch, a puddle, = Sw. dike, neut., a ditch, also a bank, dam, = Dan. dike, neut., a ditch, also a bank, dam; hence (from LG.) OF. dique, digue, F. digue = Sp. Pg. dique = It. diga, a bank, dam. The neut. forms have been compared with Gr. rīxos, a wall, rampart, rīxos, the wall of a house (for orig. **rīxos*, **rīxos*, ult. connected with dyxw, touch, and L. fingere, form, figurare, a form: see figure, futile, etc.); but the relation is improbable. The orig. sense of the neut. word is 'ditch,' a channel dug out (cf. dig, ult. from this noun) (cf. also Gr. rīxos, a marsh, swamp), dīch being in fact an assimilated form of the same word. The correlative sense of 'a bank' or 'a wall' is not usual in ME. and AS.; it is due in part to the usage of the Low Countries, where dikes in this sense are conspicuous and important.] 1. A channel for water made by digging; a ditch; a moat. See ditch. [Obsolete or archaic.]

At the things the in w'ld ben,

Two heuons hill and well dīch.

Genesie and Exodus, l. 281.

About the canal was a dyke.

Richard Coeur de Lion, l. 6021.

From one fountain in a garden there should be little channels or dykes out to every bed, and every plant growing therein.

Eng. Works of Creation, ii.

Like a shoal

Of daring fish, that on a summer morn

Adown the crystal dykes at Camelot

Come slipping o'er their shadows on the sand.

Tennyson, Gleanings.

3. A small pond or pool. [Prov. Eng.]—3. A ridge or bank of earth thrown up in excavating a canal or a ditch; specifically, such a ridge or bank thrown up to prevent low lands from being overflowed; a continuous dam confining or restraining the waters of a stream or of the sea: as, the Netherlands are defended from the sea by dikes.

The injured nation (the Dutch), driven to despair, had opened its dykes, and had called in the sea as an ally against the French tyranny. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

Dikes, that the hands of the farmers had raised with labor incessant, Shut out the turbulent tides. Longfellow, Evangeline, l. 1.

4. A low wall or fence of stone or turf, dividing or inclosing fields, etc. A dry dike is such a wall built without mortar. See fall-dike. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

I've been wash'd in Danny's wall,

And dried on Danny's dyke.

Sweet Willie and Fair Annie (Child's Ballads, II. 187).

The first dyke that we come to,

I'll turn and tell you of.

The Duke of Arles (Child's Ballads, IV. 30).

5. In geol., a fissure in rocks filled with material which has found its way into it while melted, or when brought by some other means into a fluid or semi-fluid condition. Most dikes are, in fact, filled with lava or some form of eruptive rock. A dike differs from a vein in that the latter has been slowly filled by agencies either identical with or allied in character to those ordinarily designated by the term metamorphic, while the former has, in most cases at least, been rapidly filled, so that it consists essentially of the same material through from one side to the other, and at all depths. A mineral vein or lode, on the other hand, may differ very greatly in its contents in various parts, in width as well as in depth.

dike (dik), v.; pret. and pp. diked, pp. diking. [< ME. dīken, dyken (also assimilated dichen, mod. E. ditch, v.), dig, dig out, surround with a ditch, < AS. dīcian, also in comp. be-dīcian, go-dīcian, make a ditch, surround with a ditch or dike (= OFries. dīca, dīca, dīca, dig, make a ditch, also raise a dike or dam, = D. dīken, raise a dike or dam, = MLG. LG. dīken, G. dīchen, raise a dike or dam), < dic, a ditch, = D. dijk, etc., a bank, dam: see dike, n., and cf. ditch, v., and dig.] I.; intrans. To make a ditch; dig; delve. See dig.

Section showing dikes traversing stratified rocks.

a, b, simple dikes; c, branching dike.

He wolds threabe and therto dyke and delve.

Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., l. 592.

It were better dike and delve.

And stand upon the right faith.

Then know all that the Bible saith,

And erre, as some clerkes do.

Gower, Conf. Amant, Pro.

II. trans. 1. To dig; dig out; excavate. See dig. He cried, and commanded alle Cristyne people To delve and dīc a deep diche al aboute Vntre. That holychurche stod in helynesse as hit were a pīle. Piers Plowman (C), xlii. 225.

2. To inclose with a ditch or with ditches. With all myght that he myght get, To the tounne and assayege net; And gert dīt thaim . . . stalwartly.

Barbour, MA., xvii. 271.

3. To furnish with a dike; inclose, restrain, or protect by an embankment: as, to dike a river; to dike a tract of land.—4. To surround with a stone wall.

Dike and park the samīn [land] surelle and kelp thaim sikkerle. Baifors's Pract. (A. 1556), p. 145.

dike-grave (dik'grāv), n. [< D. dijkgraaf (= MLG. dijkgrave, LG. dijkgrāve, > G. dijkgrāve), an overseer of dikes, < dijk, dike, + grāf, count (steward, reeve): see dike, and grave, graf, and cf. dike-reeve.] In the Low Countries, a superintendent of dikes.

The chief Dike-grave here is one of the greatest officers of Trust in all the Province. Howell, Lettres, I. l. 2.

diker (dik'er), n. [< ME. dīkere, < AS. dīcere, < dīcian, dig: see dike, v. Cf. ditcher, digger.] 1. A ditcher.—2. One who builds dikes.

dike-reeve (dik'rev), n. [< dīke + reeve.] An officer who superintends the dikes and drains in marshes. Hallivell. Compare dike-grave.

dilacerate (di-or di-las'g-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. dilacerated, pp. dilacerating. [< L. dilaceratus, pp. of dilacerare (> It. dilacerare = Sp. Pg. dilacerar = F. dilacerer), tear in pieces, < dil- for dis-, apart, + lacerare, tear: see lacerate.] To tear; rend asunder; separate by force; lacerate. [Rare.]

The infant, at the accomplished period, struggling to come forth, dilacerates and breaks those parts which restrained him before. St. T. Brown, Vulg. Err., iii. 6.

dilaceration (di-or di-las'g-rā'shon), n. [= F. dilaceration = Sp. dilaceración = Pg. dilaceração, < L. dilaceratio (n.), < L. dilacerare, pp. dilaceratus, tear in pieces: see dilacerate.] The act of rending asunder; a tearing or rending; laceration. [Rare.]

All the riddles of Sphinx, therefore, have two conditions annexed: viz., dilaceration to those who do not solve them; and empire to those that do.

Bacon, Physical Tables, x, Expt.

dilambdodont (di-lamb'δō-dont), n. [< Gr. δ, twice, two-, + λᾶβδον, the letter lambda (λ), + δόντ (dōnt) = E. tooth.] Having oblong molar teeth with two V-shaped ridges; specifically, having the characters of the Dilambdodont: as, a dilambdodont dentition; a dilambdodont mammal.

Dilambdodontia (di-lamb'δō-don'ti), n. pl. [NL: see dilambdodont.] A group or series of insectivorous mammals, a division of the order Beetia, having oblong molars whose crowns present two V-shaped transverse ridges, like the letter W. Such teeth are characteristic of the insectivores of northern or temperate regions, thus contrasted with tropical forms of Dilambdodontia (which see). dilatation (di-lam-i-nā'shon), n. [< dil- + latination.] In bot., the congenital development of a lamina upon the surface of an organ: a form of deduplication or choriat.

dilatator (di-lā-ni-āt), v. t. [< L. dilatatus, pp. of dilatare (> It. dilaniare), tear in pieces, < dil-, apart, + laniare, tear, rend.] To tear; rend in pieces; mangle.

The panther, when he hunts his prey, hiding his grim visage, with the sweetness of his breath allures the other beasts unto him, who, being come within his reach, he rends and cruelly doth dilatate them. Ford, Line of Life.

dilatation (di-lā-ni-ā'shon), n. [*< L. as if *dilatatio* (n.), < dilatare, pp. dilatatus, tear in pieces: see dilatate.] A tearing in pieces. Cooker.

dilatipate (di-or di-lap'i-dāt), v.; pret. and pp. dilatipated, pp. dilatipating. [Formerly also delatipate; < LL. dilatipatus, pp. of dilatipare (> It. dilatipare = Sp. Pg. dilatipar = F. dilatipder), throw away, squander, consume, destroy, lit. scatter like stones, < L. dil-, apart, + lapidare, throw stones at, < lapis (lapid), a stone: see lapidate.] I. trans. 1. To bring into a ruinous condition; impair or reduce to a state of ruin; especially, to ruin by misuse or neglect.

If the bishop, person, or vicar, &c., dilatipates the buildings, or cuts down the timber of the patrimony of the church. Blackstone.

2. To waste; squander. Was her moderation seen in dilatipating the revenues of the church? Sp. Ford.

3. To give the appearance of dilapidation to. [Rare.]

You see a very respectable-looking person in the street, and it is odds but, as you pass him, his hat comes off, his whole figure suddenly dilatipates itself, assuming a tremble of professional weakness, and you hear the overlying "qualche cosa per carità." Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 212.

II. intrans. To fall into partial or total ruin; fall by decay.

Large the domain, but all within combine To correspond with the dishonor of age; And all around dilapidate. Croft, The Borough.

dilapidation (di-or di-lap-i-dā'shon), n. [Formerly also delapidation; = F. dilapidation = Sp. dilapidación = Pg. dilapidação = It. dilapidazione, < L. dilapidatio (n.), a squandering, wasting, < dilapidare, pp. dilapidatus, squander, waste: see dilapidate.] 1. Gradual ruin or decay; disorder; especially, impairment or ruin through misuse or neglect.

Whom shall their (the bishops') successors sue for the dilapidations which they make of that credit? Hobbes, Ecclies. Polity, vii. 24.

By keeping a strict account of incomes and expenditures, a man might easily preserve an estate from dilapidation. J. Goodman, Winter Evening Conference, l.

Specifically—2. In Eng. eccles. law, the pulling down, suffering to go to decay, or ruin of any building or other property in possession of an incumbent.

dilapidator (di-or di-lap'i-dā-tor), n. [= F. dilapidateur = Sp. Pg. dilapidador = It. dilapidatore; as dilapidate + -or.] One who causes dilapidation.

It is alleged that non-residence and dilapidations for the most part go hand in hand; that you shall seldom see a non-resident, but he is also a dilapidator. W. Wharton, Defence of Fugitives, p. 124.

dilatability (di-or di-lā-tā-bil'i-ti), n. [= F. dilatabilit = Sp. dilatabilidad = Pg. dilatabilidade = It. dilatabilità, < NL. dilatabilit (t), < dilatabilis, see dilatable and -bilit.] The quality of being dilatable, or of admitting expansion, either by inherent elastic force or by the action of a force exerted from without: opposed to contractibility.

It was purely an accident dependent on the dilatability of the particular quality of alcohol employed which made the boiling-point of water 80°. Bacon, Brit., XX. 302.

dilatable (di-or di-lā-tā-bl), a. [= F. Pr. Sp. dilatable = Pg. dilatável = It. dilatabile, < NL. dilatabile, capable of expansion, < L. dilatare, expand: see dilate, v., and -able.] Capable of expansion; possessing elasticity; elastic: as, a bladder is dilatable by the force of air; air is dilatable by heat.

dilatableness (di-or di-lā-tā-bl-ness), n. Capacity for dilatation; dilatability. Bailey, 1737.

dilatancy (di-or di-lā-tān-si), n. [< dilatan (t) + -cy.] The property of granular masses of expanding in bulk with change of shape. It is due to the increase of space between the individually rigid particles as they change their relative positions.

If evidence of dilatancy were to be obtained from tangible matter, it was to be sought on the most commonplace, and what had hitherto been the least interesting, form, that of hard, separate grains—corn, sand, shot, &c.
O. Reynolds, Nature, XXXIII. 430.

dilatant (di- or di-lá'tant), a. and n. [= F. dilatant, < L. dilatant (-t), ppr. of dilatare, dilate: see dilate, v.] 1. a. Dilating; relating to dilatancy, or to a substance possessing this property.

The most striking evidence of dilatancy is obtained from the fact that, since dilatant material cannot change its shape without increasing in volume, by preventing change of volume all change of shape is prevented.
O. Reynolds, Nature, XXXIII. 430.

II. n. 1. A substance having the property of dilatancy.—2. In swrg., an instrument used to dilate, as a tent, a bougie, a sound, etc.

dilatate (di- or di-lá'tá'te), a. [= Sp. Pg. dilatado = It. dilatato, < L. dilatatus, pp. of dilatare, dilate: see dilate, v.] Dilated; broadened; or widened out: specifically said, in sociology, of an organ or a part which is disproportionately broad along a portion of its length.

dilatation (di-lá- or di-lá'tá'shon), n. [= ME. dilatacioun, < OF. (and F.) dilatation = Pr. dilatacio = Sp. dilatacion = Pg. dilatagão = It. dilatazione, < L. dilatatio (-n), an extension, < L. dilatare, pp. dilatatus, expand: see dilate, v.] 1. The act of expanding; expansion, as by heat; a spreading or enlarging in all directions; the state of being expanded or distended; distention.

I conceive the intire idea of a spirit in general, or at least of all finite created and subordinate spirits, to consist in these several powers or properties, viz: self-penetration, self-motion, self-contraction and dilatation, and indivisibility.

Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism, I. iv. § 3.
His [Spencer's] genius is rather for dilatation than compression.
Lowell, Among my Books, 3d ser., p. 162.

Rupe, Seraphic Love.

dilemma (di- or di-lem'), n. [= F. dilemme = Sp. dilema = Pg. It. dilemma = D. G. Dan. Sw. dilemma, < L. dilemma, < Gr. dilemma, a conclusion from two premises, < di + lemma, a proposition, assumption: see lemma. Not "an argument in which the adversary is 'caught between' (δυσταθέρων) two difficulties," nor derived from δυσταθέρων, be caught between.] 1. A form of argument in which it is shown that whoever maintains a certain proposition must accept one or other of two alternative conclusions, and that each of these involves the denial of the proposition in question. The alternatives are called the horns of the dilemma, which is also called a horned syllogism. The argument is also called a dilemma, in a looser sense, when the number of such horns exceeds two. The dilemma originated in rhetoric, and was not noticed by logicians before the revival of learning; consequently there has been some dispute as to its logical definition and analysis. The standard example (from Aulus Gellius) is as follows: Every woman is fair or ugly; it is not good to marry a fair wife, because she will not be attractive; therefore, it is not good to marry at all. The essential peculiarity of this reasoning is that it involves the principle of excluded middle, the falsity of which would leave ordinary syllogism intact. Logicians, however, have made the dilemma a matter of form of expression, saying that the above argument, for instance, is not a dilemma as long as the first premise reads as above, but that it becomes one if that premise is put in this form: If it is good to marry, it is good to marry a fair wife, or it is good to marry an ugly wife. They have at different times recognized the following forms as dilemmas or as parts of dilemmas, for many logicians hold that a dilemma consists of three syllogisms: (1) Simple constructive dilemma: If A, then C; if B, then C; but either B or A; hence, C. (2) Simple destructive dilemma: If A is true, B is true; if A is true, C is true; B and C are not both true; hence, A is not true. (3) Complex constructive dilemma: If A, then B; if C, then D; but either A or C; hence, either B or D. (4) Complex destructive dilemma: If A is true, B is true; if C is true, D is true; but B and D are not both true; hence, A and C are not both true. The importance of the kind of reasoning now called dilemma was first strongly insisted upon by the Stoics. Nevertheless, in the Stoical terminology a dilemma is opposed to a monolemma, as a conclusion from two premises. This was the origin of the word, and it is only later that it is met with in the modern sense.

Dilemma is an argument made of two members, repugnant one to another, wherof whichsoever thou grantest, thou art by and by taken.
Burtonville, Logic, v. 27.
2. A difficult or doubtful choice; a state of things in which the alternatives appear to be equally bad or undesirable.

A strong dilemma in a desperate case!
To act with infamy, or quit the place. Swift.

The doctrine of a Messiah offers a dilemma—a choice between two interpretations—one being purely spiritual, one purely political.
De Quincey, Emerson, II.

dilemmatic (di-lé- or di-le-mat'ik), a. dill<sup>5</sup> (dil), n. An obsolete dialectal form of dole<sup>2</sup>.

Dillenia (di-lē-ni-ē), n. [NL., named after J. J. Dillen (1687-1747), a professor of botany at Oxford.] A genus of plants, natural order Dilleniaceae.

Dilleniaceae (di-lē-ni-ē-ā-s), a. pl. [NL., < Dillenia + -aceae.] An order of polypetalous plants, nearly allied to the Ranunculaceae and Magnoliaceae, including 16 genera and about 160 species, trees or shrubs, mostly tropical.

dilleniaceous (di-lē-ni-ē-ā-shus), a. Belonging to or characteristic of the natural order Dilleniaceae.

dilling (dil'ing), n. [Appar. an assimilation of derring, older form of daring, q. v.] 1. A darling; a favorite.

The youngest and the last, and lesser than the other, Saint Helen's name dost bear, the dilling of her mother.
Dryden, Polydoron, II. 114.

Sunne, moone, and seven starres make thee the dilling of fortune.
Marston, What You Will, II. 1.

2. A child born when the father is very old. Muskeles.

dillik (dil'ik), n. [Cf. dulse.] The Irish name for the dulse, Rhododymenia palmata.

dilla (dila), n. Same as dulse.

dillue (dil'ue), v. t.; pret. and pp. dillued, pp. dilling. [Origin obscure.] In winning, to finish the dreaming of (tin-ore) in very fine hair sieves: a process now little used, if at all. [Cornwall, Eng.]

dilluer (dil'u-er), n. [See dillue.] A fine hair sieve for tin-ore. [Cornwall, Eng.]

The smallest tin which passes through the wire sieve is put into another finely woven horse-hair sieve, called a dilluer, by which and the skill of the workman it is made merchantable.
Fryer (1768).

dillweed (dil'weed), n. [Also written dillweed; < dill, 2, + weed.] Mayweed.

So down thy hill, romantic Ashbourn, glides
The Derby dilly, carrying three inmates.
G. Cunningham, in Loves of the Triangles.

dilly<sup>3</sup> (dil'i), n. A small aspidaceous tree, Miconia Strobil., specifically called the wild dilly, found on the Florida keys and in the West Indies. Its wood is very heavy and hard, of a dark-brown color, and susceptible of a beautiful polish.

dilly-dally (dil'i-dal'i), v. t. [A varied reduplication of dally. Cf. shilly-shally.] To loiter; delay; trifle. [Colloq.]

What you do, sir, do; don't stand dilly-dallying.
Richardson, Pamela, I. 275.

dilo (dē'lō), n. A Fijian name for the Calophyllum Inophyllum. See Calophyllum.

dilogical (di-or di-lō-j'i-kal), a. [< dilogy + -ical.] Having a double meaning; equivocal; ambiguous. [Rare.]

Some of the subtiler have delivered their opinions in such spurious, enigmatical, dilogical terms as the devil gave his oracles.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 10.

dilogy (dil'ō-j'i or di-lō-j'i), n. [< L. dilogia, < Gr. dialoia, repetition (cf. dialoia, repeat), < di, twice, + logos, speak.] In rhet.: (a) The use of a word or words twice in the same context; repetition, especially for the sake of emphasis. Unnecessary or ill-judged dilogy results in tautology (which see). (b) Intentional use of an ambiguous expression; the word or expression so used. Ambiguity in a wider sense is called amphiboly or ambiphology.

diluclid (di-or di-lū-ē-ēd), a. [< L. dilucidus, clear, bright, < diluere, be clear, < di, apart, + luere, be light: see lucid.] Clear; lucid.

[Obscurity of laws springs] from an ambiguous, or not so perspicuous and diluclid, description of laws.
Bacon, Learning, viii. 2.

dilucidate (di-or di-lū-ē-ēd), v. t. [< ML. "dilucidare", pp. of "dilucidare" (> It. dilucidare = Sp. Pg. dilucidar = F. dilucider), make clear, < L. dilucidus, clear: see lucid. Cf. elucidate.] To make clear; elucidate.

Dilucidating it with all the light which . . . the profoundest knowledge of the sciences had empowered him to cast upon it.
Stowe, Tristram Shandy, III. xxviii.

dilucidation (di-or di-lū-ē-ē-shun), n. [= F. dilucidation = Sp. dilucidacion = Pg. dilucidacio = It. dilucidazione, < LL. dilucidatio (-n), < L. "dilucidare", make clear: see elucidate.] The act of making clear.

Flower of Dillenia speciosa.

If such dilatations be necessary to make us value writings . . . written in an European language, and to think we must lose the elegance of the Book of Job . . . and other sacred compositions? Boyle, Works, II. 280.

dilatation (di-lá-ti-ón), n. [dilat + -ion. Cf. lucidity.] The quality of being dilated or clear. Holland, tr. of Plutarch.

dilatation (di- or di-lá-sid-i-ón), adv. Clearly; lucidly.

Nothing could be said more dilatation and fully to this whole matter. Hammond, Works, II. iv. 102.

diluent (dil-ú-ent), a. and n. [L. diluere (to wash), pp. of diluere, dilute: see dilute, v.] L. a. Diluting; serving for dilution.

Every fluid is diluent, as it contains water in it.

Arbutnot, Alimenta, v.

II. n. 1. That which dilutes, or makes more fluid; a fluid that weakens the strength or consistence of another fluid upon mixture.

There is no real diluent but water.

Arbutnot, Alimenta, v.

2. In med., a substance which increases the percentage of water in the blood. Diluents consist of water and watery liquors.

dilute (di- or di-lú-ti-ón), v. [pret. and pp. dilute, pp. diluting.] [L. dilutus, pp. of diluere (> It. diluire = Sp. Pg. diluir = F. diluer), wash away, dissolve, cause to melt, dilute, < dis, away, apart, + luere = Gr. luere, wash. Hence also (< L. diluere) diluent, diluvium.] L. trans. 1. To render more liquid; make thin or more fluid, as by mixture of a fluid of less with one of greater consistence; attenuate the strength or consistence of: often used figuratively: as, to dilute a narrative with weak reflections.

The aliment ought to be thin to dilute, demulcent to temper, or acid to subdue.

Arbutnot, Alimenta.

Hence—2. To weaken, as spirit or an acid, by an admixture of water or other liquid, which renders the spirit or acid less concentrated.—3. To make weak or weaker, as color, by mixture; reduce the strength or standard of.

The chamber was dark, lest these colours should be diluted and weakened by the mixture of any adventitious light.

Newton.

II. intrans. To become liquid or more liquid; become thin or reduced in strength: as, vinegar dilutes easily.

dilute (di- or di-lú-ti-ón), a. [It. diluto, < L. dilutus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Thin; attenuated; reduced in strength, as spirit or color.

Dilute acids are almost without action.

Benedict, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 121.

2. Weak; paltry; poor.

They had but dilute ideas of God's nature, and scant discoveries of his will.

Barrow, Sermons, III. iii.

diluteness (di- or di-lú-ti-nes), n. The state of being dilute; thinness.

What that diluteness is which Vossius saith is more proper to F than Q, I understand not.

Sp. Wilkins, Real Character, III. 12.

diluter (di- or di-lú-ti-er), n. One who or that which dilutes.

dilation (di- or di-lú-shi-ón), n. [F. dilution (cf. Sp. dilución = Pg. diluição), < L. dilatio (cf. dilat, pp. dilatus, dilute: see dilute).] 1. The act of making thin, weak, or more liquid; the thinning or weakening of a fluid by mixture; the state of being diluted: often used figuratively with respect to argument, narration, or the like.

Opposite to dilation is coagulation or thickening.

Arbutnot, Alimenta, v.

2. A diluted substance; the result of diluting.

dilutionist (di- or di-lú-shi-ón-ist), n. [dilution + -ist.] In homeopathy, one who advocates the medicinal use of drugs in a diluted or attenuated state.—High-dilutionist, a homeopathist who advocates extreme dilution or attenuation of drugs.—Low-dilutionist, one who takes a less extreme view than the preceding.

diluvial (di- or di-lú-vi-ál), a. [F. Pg. diluvial, < LL. diluvialis, of a flood, < L. diluvium, a flood: see diluvium.] 1. Pertaining to a flood or deluge, especially to the deluge recorded in Genesis.—2. In geol., related to or consisting of diluvium.

diluvialist (di- or di-lú-vi-ál-ist), n. [diluvial + -ist.] One who endeavors to explain geological phenomena by reference to a general flood or deluge, particularly the Noachian deluge.

diluvian (di- or di-lú-vi-án), a. [F. diluvien = Sp. Pg. It. diluviano; as diluvium + -an.] Relating to or of the nature of a deluge; diluvial.

Interior Alps, gigantic crew,
Who triumphed o'er diluvian power Wordsworth, Descent of Stanzas.

diluvianism (di- or di-lú-vi-án-izm), n. [diluvian + -ism.] A geological theory which is largely based on the supposition of the former occurrence of a universal deluge. In the early history of geology the deluge played an important part, and many leading facts were explained by reference to it.

Linguistic philology has been actually created by it (the scientific movement of the age) out of the crude observations and wild delusions of earlier times, as truly as chemistry out of alchemy, or geology out of diluvianism. Whitney, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 768.

diluviate (di- or di-lú-vi-át), v. t. [L. diluviatus, pp. of diluere, overflow, deluge, < diluvium, a flood, deluge: see diluvium, and cf. deluge, v.] To overflow; run, as a flood.

These inundations have so wholly diluviated over all the south. Sir R. Sandy, State of Keligton, sig. 82 (1806).

diluvial, diluvy, n. [ME. diluvice, deluice, < L. diluvium, flood, deluge: see diluvium and deluge.] Deluge.

This deluvie of pestilence.

Chaucer, L'Envoy to Scogan, l. 14.

In the diluvy or general flood, he caused the married household of Noe, y<sup>e</sup> foren virgines perishing therein.

Sp. Bale, Apology, fol. 101.

The diluvy drowned not the world in one day.

Joye, Expos. of Daniel, x.

diluvion (di- or di-lú-vi-ón), n. [F. diluvion, < L. diluvio (n.), equiv. to diluvium: see diluvium.] Same as diluvium.

diluvium (di- or di-lú-vi-um), n. [F. diluvium = Sp. Pg. It. diluvio, < L. diluvium (also diluvius and diluvia, a flood, deluge (whence ult. E. deluge, q. v.), < diluvare, wash away: see dilute.] 1. A deluge or an inundation; an overflowing.—2. Coarse detrital material, wherever found: a term introduced into geology in consequence of a general belief in the past occurrence of a universal deluge. Finer materials, usually occupying the lower parts of valleys, and occurring especially along the courses of great rivers, were called diluvium (which see). In the use of the words diluvium and diluvial (diluvial) there is an obscure recognition of a fundamental fact in geology, namely, that rivers have been gradually diminishing in volume, a condition which necessarily connects itself with diminished erosive power. But the idea of a catastrophic period of diluvial action, preceded and followed by repose, such as lies at the base of the belief in the deluge, is no longer in vogue, and the word diluvium has become almost obsolete except among German geologists.

diluvy, n. See diluvie.

dilweed, n. See dilweed.

dim (dim), a. and n. [ME. dim, dym, < AS. dim, dim = OFries. dim = *OS. *dim* (found only once, altered to thim, in a verse alliterating with th) = Isel. dímmer, dim (cf. Sw. dimma, a fog, mist, haze, dimmig, foggy), = OHG. timber, MHG. timmer, timmer, dark, dim. Prob. not connected with OHG. demar, MHG. demere, twilight (whence G. dämern (> Dan. dæmre), be dim, dämmerung (> Dan. dæmring), dimness, twilight), L. temer for **temere*, darkness, = Skt. tamisá, dark, night; cf. Skt. tamasa, gloom, Lith. tamasa, dark, tamasa, darkness, Russ. temenit, dim, dark, temno, darkly, Ir. toim, dim.)] 1. a. comp. dimmer, superl. dimmest. 1. Faintly luminous; somewhat obscure from lack of light or luminosity; dark; obscure; shadowy.

When any schalle dye, the Lyghts begynne to change and to dye dim. Mansueti, Travels, p. 60.

And stored windows richly light,
Casting a dim religious light.

Milton, II Penseroso, l. 160.

2. Not clearly seen; indistinct; obscured by some intervening medium imperfectly transparent, as mist or haze; misty; hazy; hence, figuratively, not clearly apprehended; faint; vague: as, a dim prospect; a dim recollection.

Vnto me as this misty dim.
But sun knowing I have by him.

Boyd Reed (R. E. T. S.), p. 22.

I have most dim apprehensions of the four great monarchies.

Leach, Old and New Schoolmaster.
Dim with the mist of years, gray fits the shade of power.

Byron, Child Harold, II. 2.

The light about the altar was the only light in the church; the nave and aisles were dim in the twilight.

C. E. Norton, Travel and Study in Italy, p. 6.

3. Dull in luster; lusterless; tarnished.

How is the gold become dim / how is the most fine gold changed!

Lam. iv. 1.
4. Not seeing clearly; having the vision obscured and indistinct, as the eye.

On the stranger's dim and dying eye
The soft, sweet pictures of his childhood lie.

Waltier, Bridal of Penneock, vi.

Eyes grown dim
With hope of change that came not.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 228.

5. Not clearly apprehending; dull of apprehension.

The understanding is dim.

= Syn. 2. Indistinct, ill-defined, indefinite, shadowy, confused, mysterious, imperfect.

II. n. The dark; darkness; night.

Wen the day vp drogh, & the dym voddit,
All the troiens fall it tokyn thaire armys,
That were hoole and vahunt hastid to fild.

dim (dim), v.; pret. and pp. dimmed, ppr. dimming. [ME. dimmen, make dim, become dim, < *AS. *dimman*, in comp. d-dimman, for dimman, make dim (= Isel. dimma, become dim), < dim, n.: see dim, a.] 1. trans. To make dim, faint, or obscure; render less bright, clear, or distinct; becloud; obscure; tarnish; sully: as, to dim the eye; to dim the vision; to dim the prospect; to dim gold.

I hate to see, mine eyes are dimmed with tears.

Hee is nature's fresh picture newly drawn in Oyle, which time and much handling dimmes and defaces.

Sp. Foris, Micro-cosmographie, A. Child.

Thus while he spake, each passion dimmed his face,
Thrice changed with pale fire, envy, and despair.

Milton, P. L., iv. 114.

II. intrans. To become dim, faint, or obscure; fade.

Turning the dimming light into yellow murr.

dim. An abbreviation of diminution.

dimaria, dimatis (dim-a-ris, -tis), n. [An artificial term.] The mnemonic name of that mood of the fourth figure of syllogism which has affirmative propositions for its premises, one universal, the other particular. The oldest name for this mood seems to have been dimaria, of which dimatis is an improvement, and dimaris is now most commonly in use. The following is an example of this mood: Some commendable actions are recognized by the political economists; but every action recognized by the economists is a selfish one; therefore, some selfish actions are commendable. The letters of the word have the following significations: d, a, and i show the quantity and quality of the propositions; m, that the reduction is to darri; s, that the premises are transposed in reduction; a, that the conclusion of the reduction is to be simply converted. See A. 1 (3), and conversion, 2.

dimastiga (di-mas-ti-gi), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + mastis (μαστις), a whip (flagellum).] A division of the pantostomatous or true flagellate infusorians, containing those which have two flagella: distinguished from Monomastiga and Polymastiga.

dimastigata (di-mas-ti-gát), a. [As Dimastiga + -ata.] Biflagellate; having two flagella; specifically, of or pertaining to the Dimastiga.

dimatis, n. See dimaria.

dimblet (dim-bli), n. [The equiv. form dimple seems to be a variation of dimble, and dimble a variation (perhaps through association with dim: of the epithet gloomy in the quotations) of the equiv. R. dial. dumble, a wooded dingle. Origin unknown; possibly a dim, of damp, a pit, a pool, a deep hole containing water: see damp. Cf. E. dial. drumble, drumbow, a dingle or ravine, appar. not connected with dumble.] A dingle; a glen; a retired place.

And Satyr, that in shades and gloomy dimblet dwell,
Run whooping to the hills to clap their ruder hands.

Drayton, Polyolbion, II. 120.

Within a gloomy dimble shade doth dwell,
Down in a pit, o'ergrown with brakes and briars.

R. Jones, Bad Shepherd, II. 2.

dim (dim), n. and a. [Also, as a historical term (def. 1), dim; < ME. dyme, dieme, tithes, < OF. dieme, F. dieme, tithes, tenth, = Pr. decime, decime, < L. decimus, tenth, < decem = E. ten: see decimal.] 1. a. 1. A tithes.

Take hie [their] landes, go lordes and let hem [prelatis] lyue by dim.

Piers Plowman (B), iv. 525.

2. The number ten.

Every title soul, amongst many thousand *dim*es,
Hath been as dear as Helen.

Shak., T. and C., II. 2.

3. A silver coin of the United States, of the value of 10 cents, being the tenth part of a dollar, worth about 4 pence English.

II. a. Solid for a dim—dim.

Every title soul, amongst many thousand *dim*es,
Hath been as dear as Helen.

Shak., T. and C., II. 2.

4. A silver coin of the United States, of the value of 10 cents, being the tenth part of a dollar, worth about 4 pence English.

II. a. Solid for a dim—dim.

Every title soul, amongst many thousand *dim*es,
Hath been as dear as Helen.

II. a. Solid for a dim—dim.

Every title soul, amongst many thousand *dim*es,
Hath been as dear as Helen.

Shak., T. and C., II. 2.

...a story related to a group term, and usually add to it a time applied especially to supernatural phenomena.

Dimorphism (di-mor'fizm), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + moros, length, + idos, Ionic for ideos = form.] A notable genus of Japanese moths, of the family Thyridae, related to Urethodes, having teeth of two lengths (whence the name), and the anterior incisors broad and spatulate. The dorsal formula is: 8 incisors in each upper, 8 in each lower half; 1 anal, 5 preanal, and 3 anal in each half-jaw. The type-species is D. dimorpha, having the general aspect of Urethodes (spatulate); tail vertebrae half the length of the head and body, coles and palps entirely scaly, and stout pilose. Originally misspelled Dymecodon. F. W. True, 1884.

dimension (di-men'shun), n. [OF. dimension, F. dimension = Pr. dimensio = Sp. dimension = Pg. dimensão = It. dimensione = D. dimensio = G. Dan. Sw. dimension, < L. dimensio (n.), a measuring, extent, dimension, diameter or axis, < dimetri, pp. dimensus, measure off, measure out (cf. ppr. dimotion (t)-s, as a noun, diameter), < di- for dis, apart, + metiri, measure: see measure.] 1. Magnitude measured along a diameter; the measure through a body or closed figure along one of its principal axes; length, breadth, or thickness. Thus, a line has one dimension, length; a plane surface two, length and breadth; and a solid three, length, breadth, and thickness. The number of dimensions being equal to the number of principal axes, and that to the number of independent directions of extension, it has become usual, in mathematics, to express the number of ways of spread of a figure by saying that it has two, three, or n dimensions, although the idea of measurement is quite extraneous to the fact expressed. The word generally occurs in the plural, referring to length, breadth, and thickness.

So does those skills, whose quick eyes do explore
The just dimension both of earth and heaven.

Sir J. Davies, Dancing, st. 25.
A dark
Illimitable ocean, without bound,
Without dimension, where length, breadth, and height,
And time, and place, are lost.

Milton, P. L., II. 882.
These as a line their long dimension drew,
Striking the ground with sinuous trace.

Milton, P. L., VII. 480.
Hence—2. A mode of linear magnitude involved (generally along with others) in the quantity to which it belongs. (a) In alg., a variable factor, the number of dimensions of an expression being the number of variable factors in that term for which this number is the largest. (b) In phys., a linear measure of length, time, mass, or any kind of quantity regarded as a fundamental factor of the quantity of which it is a dimension. If M, L, T, are the units of mass, length, and time, the dimensions of a velocity are said to be LT<sup>-1</sup>, or one dimension of length and minus one of time; those of an acceleration are said to be LT<sup>-2</sup>; those of a momentum, MLT<sup>-1</sup>; those of a force, MLT<sup>-2</sup>; those of a quantity of energy, MLT<sup>-2</sup>; those of the action of a moving system, MLT<sup>-2</sup>; those of a horse-power, MLT<sup>-2</sup>; those of a pressure, ML<sup>-1</sup>T<sup>-2</sup>; those of a density, ML<sup>-3</sup>; etc.

We are justified in considering the range, the flat pencil, and the axial pencil; as of the same dimensions, since to every point in the first corresponds one ray in the second and one plane in the third.

Oswald, Projective Geometry (tr. by Levensdorf).
3. Bulk; size; extent or capacity: commonly in the plural: as, the question is assuming great dimensions.

The shapely limb and lubricated joint,
Within the small dimensions of a point.

Cropper, Retirement.
In dimension, and the shape of nature,
A gracious person.

Shak., T. N., I. 5.
My friend's dimensions as near as possible approximate to mine.

Lamb, Bachelor's Complaint.
4. That which has extension; matter; especially, the human body and its organs: so often in the plural.

A spirit I am, indeed;
But am in that dimension grossly clad,
Which from the womb I did participate.

Shak., T. N., v. 1.
Why bastard? wherefore base?
When my dimensions are as well compact,
My mind as generous, and my shape as true,
As honest madmen's issue?

Shak., Lear, I. 2.
Method of dimensions, a method of treating some dynamical and other problems, by considering only the dimensions of the different quantities, not their magnitudes.

dimensional (di-men'shun-al), a. [cf. dimension, n.] To measure the dimensions of; proportion.

[Rare.]
I propose to break and calve it by compartments in colour, according to the enclosed sketch, which you must adjust and dimension.

Wells, Letters, I. 285.
dimensional (di-men'shun-al), a. [cf. dimension + -al.] 1. Pertaining to extension in space; having a dimension or dimensions; measurable in one or more directions: used in composition: as, a line is a one-dimensional, a surface a two-dimensional, and a solid a three-dimensional object.—2. Relating to dimension: as, a dimensional equation.

dimensionality (di-men'shun-al'i-ti), n. [cf. dimension + -ality.] The number of dimensions of a quantity.

dimensioned (di-men'shun-d), a. [cf. dimension + -ed.] Having dimensions. [Rare.]

A mantle purple-ting'd, and radiant vest, Dimension'd equal to his sin.

Pope, Odysey, xix.
dimensionless (di-men'shun-less), a. [cf. dimension + -less.] Without dimensions or bulk.

Their prayers
Flew up, nor mix'd the way: . . . in they pass'd Dimensionless through heavenly doors.

Milton, P. L., xi. 17.

dimension-lumber (di-men'shun-lum'ber), n. Lumber cut to specified sizes.

dimension-work (di-men'shun-werk), n. Masonry consisting of stones whose dimensions are fixed by specification.

dimensiony (di-men'shun-i), n. [Irreg. < L. dimensus, pp. of dimetri (see dimension), after immensity.] Dimension; extent; capacity.

Of the smallest stars in sky
We know not the dimensiony.

Hensell, Letters, IV. 44.

dimensiony (di-men'shun-i), a. [cf. L. dimensus, pp. (see dimension), + -y.] Diametral; pertaining to the principal axes of a body or figure.

All bodies have their measure and their space,
But who can draw the soul's dimensiony lines?

Sir J. Davies, Nosce Teipsum, st. 28.

dimensum (di-men'shun), n. [cf. ML. dimensum (neut. of L. dimensus, pp. of dimetri, measure out: see dimension), equiv. to L. dimensum, a measured allowance, ration (of alms), neut. of dimensus, pp. of dimetri, measure out, measure, < de, down, + metiri, measure: see measure.] A portion measured out; a dole.

You are to blame to use the poor dumb Christians
So cruelly, defraud 'em of their dimensum.

B. Jonson, New Inn, III. 1.

Dimera (dim'e-ra), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dimerus: see dimerus.] 1. A group of coleopterous insects. Latreille, 1807.—2. A division of hemipterous insects in which the tarsi are two-jointed, as in the Aphididae and Psyllidae, or plant-lice. The group was formerly a section of Homoptera; it corresponds to the modern group Phytophagaria, excepting the Coccidae or scale-insects, whose tarsi are one-jointed. Westwood, 1840.

dimeran (dim'e-ran), a. and n. [cf. Dimera + -an.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dimera.
II. n. One of the Dimera.

[cf. di- + metyl + aniline.] An oily liquid, C<sub>6</sub>H<sub>5</sub>(CH<sub>3</sub>)<sub>2</sub>, obtained by heating aniline with methyl alcohol and hydrochloric acid. It solidifies at 41° F., and forms liquid salts with acids. It is a base from which certain dyes are prepared.

dimetric (di-met'rik), a. [cf. Gr. di-, two-, + metros, a measure, + -ic. See dimeter.] In crystal., having the vertical axis longer or shorter than the two equal lateral axes, as the square octahedron.—Dimetric system. See tetragonal.

dimotiation (dim-i-ká'shun), n. [cf. L. dimotio (n-), a fight, < dimicare, pp. dimicatus, fight, lit. brandish (one's weapons against the enemy), < di-, dis- (intensive) + micare, move quickly to and fro, shake, vibrate, dash.] A battle or fight; contest; the act of fighting. Johnson.

Let us now be not mere spongers of our tears, to wash off the memory of these our unbrotherly dimotiations.

Sp. Hall, Mystery of Godliness.

dimidiate (di-mid'i-ét), v. t.; pret. and pp. dimidiated, ppr. dimidiating. [cf. L. dimidiatus, pp. of (LL.) dimidiare, halve, < dimidius, adj., half, neut. dimidium, a half (> ult. dimid, q. v.), < di-, dis-, apart, + medius, middle: see middle, medium.] To divide into two equal parts. In her.: (a) To cut in halves, showing only one half. Thus, when a shield bearing a lion is impaled with a shield bearing a chevron, these bearings may be each represented in full in the half shield, or each bearing may be dimidiated—that is, one half of the lion and one half of the chevron only shown. This, however, is liable to lead to confusion, and is rare. (b) To cut off a part, as a half or nearly so, from any bearing. Thus, a sword dimidiated would show the hilt and half of the blade only, and would appear as if the other half had been cut away.

dimidiato (di-mid'i-ét), a. [cf. L. dimidiatus, pp.: see the verb.] Divided into two equal parts; halved; hence, half the usual size, or half as large as something else. Specifically—(a) In bot. and entom., having, as an organ, one part so much smaller than the other as to appear to be missing, or altogether wanting. (b) Split into two on one side, as the calyptra of some mosses. (c) In anat. and anat., representing or represented by only one half; one-sided: specifically applied to cases of hermaphroditism in which the organism is male on one side of the body and female on the other. See hermaphroditism.

Insects, like crustaceans, are occasionally subject to one-sided or dimidiato hermaphroditism.

Owen, Anat.
(d) In her., reduced or diminished by half.—Dimidiato elytra, in entom., elytra which cover but half of the abdomen.—Dimidiato fascia, line, etc., in entom., one which traverses half of a wing or elytron, or extends halfway round a part, as the antennae.

dimidiation (di-mid-i-ét'shun), n. [cf. LL. dimidiatio (n-), < dimidiare, halve: see dimidiato, v.] The act of halving; division into two equal parts; the state of being halved.

The earliest system of impalement was by dimidiation: that is, by cutting two shields in half, and placing together the dexter half of one and the sinister half of the other, and thus forming a single composition.

C. Boutell, Heraldry, p. 220.

Dimidiation formula, an expression for the sine, etc., of the half of an angle in terms of similar functions of the angle itself.

diminacoe, n. Same as diminacoe.

dimin. An abbreviation of diminuendo.

diminish (di-min'ish), v. [Early mod. E., with suffix -ish<sup>3</sup> (after minish), for ME. diminuen, < F. diminuer = Pr. diminuir, diminuer, diminuer = Sp. Pg. diminuir = It. diminuire, < ML. diminuere, a common but incorrect form of L. diminuere, make smaller, lessen, diminish, < de, from, + minuere, lessen, make small, < minuere, less: see minus, minish, minute. L. diminuere (or diminuere) means 'break into small pieces,' < di-, dis-, apart, asunder, + minuere, make small.] I. trans. 1. (1) As conjectured by Dietz, Seheiler, Littre, and others, < L. (ML.) as if **deonare*, < de- intensive + onare, dine, sup. < ona, dinner, supper. (2) More prob., since OF. diner was used rather of breakfast than of dinner, it is a contr. of dejuner, dejuner, dejuner, dejuner, F. déjeuner, breakfast, > E. déjeuner; if this is so, It. diinare, diinare, is of F. origin, the prop. It. form, corresponding to OF. dejuner, being di-giunare = Pr. dejunar, fast: see di-giune, dejuner. Hence dinner.] I trans. To eat the chief meal of the day; take dinner; in a more general sense, to partake of a repast; eat.

We went all to Mounte Syon to mass; and the same day we dined with ye warden and freese there, where we had a right honest dyner.

Sir R. Guyford, Fyrgymage, p. 29.

There came a bird out o' a bush,
On water for to dine.

The Water o' Weir's Well (Child's Ballad, I. 195).

The hungry judges soon the sentence sign,
And wretches hang that jury-men may dine.

Pope, R. of the L., III. 25.

Serenely full, the epicure would say,
Fate cannot harm me, I have dined to-day.

Sydney Smith, Receipt for Salad.

To dine out, to take dinner elsewhere than at one's own residence.—To dine with Duke Humphrey, to be dinnerless: a phrase said to have originated from the circumstance that a part of the public walks in Old St. Paul's, London, was called Duke Humphrey's Walk (being near his tomb), and that those who could not pay for a dinner at a tavern were accustomed to promenade there, in the hope of meeting an acquaintance and getting an invitation to dine. The phrase, however, may be connected with the report that Duke Humphrey, son of Henry IV., was starved to death.

II. trans. 1. To give a dinner to; furnish with the principal meal; entertain at dinner: as, the landlord dined a hundred men.

A table massive enough to have dined Johnnie Armstrong and his merry men.

dinghy, dingey (ding'gi), s. [< Beng. dingi, a boat, wherry, passage-boat, dingi (cerebral d), a ship, sloop, coasting-vessel.] An East Indian name for a boat varying in size in different localities. The dinghies of Bombay are from 12 to 20 feet long, 5 to 7 feet broad, and about 5 feet deep, with a raking mast, and are navigated by three or four men. The dinghies of Calcutta are small passage-boats for the poorer classes, rarely used with a sail; they are not painted, but merely rubbed with nut-oil. The name is also applied to a ship's working-boat, especially to the smallest boat of a man-of-war; and in some parts of the United States it is used for a flat-bottomed boat, which is also called a dory. Also written dingy, dingy, dingos, and dingy.

The Commissioner was fain to set out sleepy and breakfastless towards the shore in the dingy, accompanied by guns, ammunition, false birds, and the paraphernalia of the fatal art.

Shore Birds, p. 20.

dingy (din'ji-li), adv. [< dingy + -ly.] In a dingy manner; so as to give a dingy appearance.

dinitrocellulose (di-ni'trö-sel'ü-lös), a. [di-ni' + nitro + cellulose.] A substance, analogous to gun-cotton, but differing from it in being soluble in alcohol and ether, produced by the action of a mixture of sulphuric and nitric acids on cotton. Collodion is a solution of this substance in ether and alcohol. Also called soluble pyroxylin.

dink (dingk), v. t. [Origin obscure.] To deck; dress; adorn. [Scotch.]

Do as you will—for me, I am now too old to dink myself as a gallant to grace the bower of dames. Scott, Abbot, x.

dink (dingk), a. [See dink, v.] Neatly dressed; trim; tidy. [Scotch.] Also denk.

My lady's dink, my lady's dress,
The sower and fancy o' the west.

Burns, My Lady's Gown.

The mechanic, in his leathern apron, elbowed the dink and dainty dame, his city mistress.

Scott, Kenilworth, xiv.

dinman, dinmont (din'man, din'munt), a. [Also dinmont, dinmont; origin obscure; possibly a corruption of inimicus, equiv. to poisoning.] A weather between one and two years old, or that has not yet been twice shorn. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

dinna (din'ä), [Sc., < do (Sc. also die) + na = E. no, adv. So. Sc. anna, uina or uinnä, innä, etc.] Do not.

Now laird, . . . dinna be an dooms down-hearted as a that.

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xx.

dinner (din'er), a. [ME. diner, dyner, < OF. dinner, dinner, or rather breakfast, F. diner, dinner; prop. int., OF. diner, F. diner, dine, used as a noun: see dine.] 1. The principal meal of the day, taken at midday or later, even in the evening. In medieval and modern Europe the common meal, down to the middle of the eighteenth century, was to take this meal about midday, or in more primitive times even as early as 8 or 10 A. M. In France, under the old regime, the dinner-bell was at 1 or 2 in the afternoon; but when the Constituent Assembly moved to Paris, since it sat until 4 or 5 o'clock, the hour for dining was postponed. The custom of dining at 6 o'clock or later has since become common, except in the country, where early dinner is still the general practice. See extract under dinner-hour.

They washed toggyer and wyped both,
And set tyll they dyner.

Lyall Geste of Robyn Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 50).

Let me not stay a jot for dinner: go, get it ready.

Shak., Lear, I. 4.

2. An entertainment; a feast; a dinner-party.

Thence Mychodemus recovered hym in to his house and made hym a grete dyner.

Joseph of Arimathea (R. E. T. S.), p. 29.

He that will make the Feste will saye to the Hostellere, Arraye for me, to morwe, a gode Dyner, for so many folk.

Mundeville, Travels, p. 214.

Behold, I have prepared my dinner.

Mat. xxii. 4.

To-morrow, if we live,
Our ponderous squires will give A grand political dinner
To half the squallions near.

Templeton, Maud, xi.

dinner (din'er), v. t. [< dinner, a.] To take dinner; dine. [Scotch.]

See far I sprackled up the brae,
I dinner'd wi' a lord.

Burns, On Meeting Lord Daer.

dinner-hour (din'er-ür), a. The hour at which dinner is taken; dinner-time. See dinner.

The Court dinner-hour, in the reign of George III., was at the Hanoverian hour of four o'clock. During the reign of George IV. it gradually crept up to six o'clock, and finally became steady at the Indian hour of seven, and so remained until the reign of Her Most gracious Majesty, when the formal Court dinner-hour became eight o'clock. These innovations on the national hours of meals did not meet the approval of the medical faculty, and in consequence a dinner at two o'clock was prescribed. This has ever since been the favorite Court meal, being in reality a substantial hot repast, which has exploded the old-fashioned luncheon of cold viands.

The Queen (London newspaper).

dinnerless (din'er-less), a. [< dinner + -less.] Having no dinner or food; fasting.

To dine with Duke Humphrey, importing to be dinnerless.

Fuller, Worthies, London.

Then with another humorous rath remark'd
The lussy mowers labouring dinnerless.

Shak., M. of V., I. 1.

Al! What hour is 't, Lollo?
Let Towards bolly-hour, sir.

Al! Dinner time! thou mean'st twelve o'clock?

Middleton, Changing, I. 2.

Move on; for it grows towards dinner-time.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, II. 249.

dinner-wagon (din'er-wag'ün), a. A set of light shelves, as a dumb-waiter, usually mounted on casters and easily movable, for the service of a dining-room. Compare dumb-waiter.

dinnery (din'er-i), a. [< dinner + -ry.] Suggesting dinner; having the odor of dinner.

I . . . disliked the dinnery atmosphere of the salle à manger.

Mrs. Gaskell, Curious if True.

dinnle (din'nl), v. t. [pret. and pp. dinnled, ppr. dinnling. [Sc.: see dindle.] 1. Same as dindle.—2. To make a great noise.

The dinnle drums alarm our ears,
The sergeant screeches far loud.

Fergusson, Poems, II. 22.

dinnle (din'nl), a. [Sc., < dinnle, v.] A tremulous motion, especially with reverberation; a vibration; a thrill. [Scotch.]

Ane says thinks, at the first dinnle o' the sentence, they has heart enough to die rather than bide out the sax weeks, but they aye bide the sax weeks out for a that.

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxv.

dino- [NL., etc., also sometimes deino-, < Gr. deos, terrible, fearful, mighty, < deis, fear, terror.] An element in many scientific words of Greek origin, meaning 'terrible, mighty, huge.'

dinobryian (din-ö-brí-i-an), a. and a. [< Dinobryon + -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dinobryina.

II. a. A member of the Dinobryina.

Dinobryida (din-ö-brí-i-dä), a. pl. [NL., < Dinobryon + -ida.] A family of flagellate infusorians, represented by the genera Dinobryon and Epipyra.

Dinobryon

Dinobryon (di-nö-brí-i-on), a. pl. [NL., < Dinobryon + -ion.] 1. In Ehrenberg's system of classification (1836), a family of loricate unappendaged infusorians of changeable form.—2. In Stein's system of classification (1878), a family of flagellate infusorians, represented by the genera Dinobryon and Epipyra.

Dinobryon (di-nö-brí-on), a. [NL., < Gr. dinos, a whirling, a round area, + bryon, seaweed, tree-moss, lichen.] A genus of collar-bearing monads or flagellate infusorians, type of the family Dinobryidae. These animalcules inhabit fresh water. They are biflagellate, with one long and one short flagellum, attached by a posterior contractile ligament within the individual cells or lorices of a compound branching polythodium, built up by successive terminal gemination of zooids. The endoplasm contains two lateral color-bands and usually an anterior pigment-spot like an eye. The best-known species is D. acicularis. Also written Dinobryum. Ehrenberg, 1836.

Dinocerat (di-nö-s'er-at), a. [NL., < Gr. deinos, terrible, mighty, < deis, horn.] One of the genera of the Dinocerata, giving name to the group: so called from the extraordinary protuberances of the skull, representing three pairs of horn-cores. The species, as D. mirabilis, D. latissimus, were huge ungulates, with 5-toed feet and 3 pairs of horns, 6 molars, long, trenchant upper canines, and no upper incisors. Their remains occur in the early Tertiary deposits of North America.

Skull of Dinocerat mirabilis.

Dinocerata (di-nö-s'er-a-tä), a. pl. [NL., pl. of Dinocerat (-ä).] A group of extinct Eocene perissodactyl mammals. By some the forms are held to constitute an order; by others they are referred to an order Amphipode (which see), or placed in a family Uistatheriidae (which see). The leading genera are Uistatherium, Dinoceras, Plioceras, and Laelophodon.

dinocrate (di-nö-s'er-ät), a. and a. I. a. Pertaining to the Dinocerata.

II. a. One of the Dinocerata.

Dinoflagellate (din-ö-flaj-e-lät), a. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dinoflagellatus: see dinoflagellate.] Those flagellate infusorians commonly called Cilioflagellata (which see). The name was given because the structure before regarded as a grille of cilia seemed to be a second flagellum lying in the transverse groove which nearly all these infusorians possess in addition to the longitudinal one. The Dinoflagellata are named as a class, and divided into Adinidia and Dinifera. Bütschli.

dinoflagellate (din-ö-flaj-e-lät), a. [< NL. dinoflagellatus, < Gr. dinos, a whirling, a round area, + NL. flagellum: see flagellum.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dinoflagellata; cilioflagellate, in the usual sense of that word.

dinomic (di-nom'ik), a. [< Gr. dinos, two, + nomos, a district (or vou, distribution), < nomos, distribute.] Belonging to two of the great divisions of the earth: used in relation to the distribution of plants.

Dinomys (di-nö-mi-i-ds), a. pl. [NL., < Dinomys + -ida.] A family of hystricomorphic rodents of South America, combining characters of the cavies, agoutis, and chinchillas with the general appearance of the paca. They have four toes on each foot with somewhat foot-like nails, and the upper lip cleft, contrary to the rule in this series of rodents. There is but one genus, Dinomys.

Dinomys (di-nö-mis), a. [NL. (Peters, 1873), < Gr. deinos, terrible, mighty, + mys = E. mouse.] The typical and only genus of the family Dinomysidae. D. brevis, the only species, resembles the paca: it is about 2 feet long, with a bushy tail 9 inches long, the body short, the ears and limbs short, and the pelage harsh, of a grizzled color, with two white stripes and many white spots on the back and head. It inhabits Peru.

Dinopidae (di-nop-i-ds), a. pl. [NL., < Dinopis + -ida.] A family of saltigrade spiders distinguished by very long and fine extremities. They build a long irregular web, generally between trees, and sit in the middle with the front pair of legs stretched out.

Dinopis (di-nö-pis), a. [NL., < Gr. deinos, terrible, < deis, fierce-eyed (of the Erinyes), < deis, terrible, < deis, + ops, eye.] A genus of spiders, typical of the family Dinopidae.

Dinornis (di-nôr'nis), n. [NL., less prop. Deinornis, < Gr. deînô, terrible, mighty, + ôrnîs, bird.]

Skeleton of Dinornis.
Museum of Natural History, New York.

The typical and only genus of the extinct family Dinornithidae. Numerous species, as D. giganteus, D. elephantinus, etc., have been described by Owen, differing much in size; the largest must have stood about 14 feet high, and had thigh-bones stouter than those of a horse. The general figure of these huge flightless birds was like that of the ostrich, but the size was much greater, and the legs were both relatively and absolutely much stouter. See moa.

Dinornithes (di-nôr-nî-thēs), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Dinornis (-ornith-).] A general name of the moas and moa-like birds; a superfamily containing the Dinornithidae and Paleopterygidae. Also called Immanes.

dinornithic (di-nôr-nî-th'ik), a. [< Dinornis (-ornith-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dinornithidae; moa-like.

A large bird, combining dinornithic and struthious characters. A. Newton, Encyc. Brit.

Dinornithidae (di-nôr-nî-th'î-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dinornis (-ornith-) + -idae.] A family of gigantic extinct ratite birds of New Zealand; the moas. They were characterized by an enormous development of the legs and pelvis in comparison with the rest of the skeleton, a ratite or flat sternum, and rudimentary wings. The extinction of the group is quite recent, since portions of the soft parts have been found, and traditions are current respecting the living birds; but the period to which they survived is not exactly known. See moa.

Dinornithoides (di-nôr-nî-thô'idē-s), n. pl. [NL., < Dinornis (-ornith-) + -oides.] A superfamily of birds: same as Dinornithes or Immanes.

dinos (di'nos), n.; pl. dinai (-nî). [Gr. δινος, a whirling, a round area, a round vase or goblet. Cf. dinus.] In Gr. antiqu., a large open vase of full-curved shape. It may be considered a form of the crater.

dinosaur (di'nô-sâr), n. One of the Dinosauria. Also spelled deinosaur.

Dinosauria (di'nô-sâr'î-â), n. pl. [NL., less prop. Deinosauria, < Dinosaurus, q. v.] A group of extinct Mesozoic reptiles, mostly of gigantic or colossal size. They were characterized by distinctly socketed teeth; generally flat or slightly cupped vertebrae, some of which were opisthocoelous; a sacrum of four or more vertebrae; numerous caudal vertebrae; a structure of the skull in many respects intermediate between the crocodilian and lacertilian types; ambulatory or saltatory limbs; fore limbs reduced and not known to have had clavicles; and hind limbs usually disproportionately developed, and with the pelvis presenting a series of modifications tending toward the characters of birds, on which account the group is also called Ornithoscelidae (which see). The cranial structure of the legs is best seen in the smaller genera, such as Compsognathus; it is exhibited in the presence of a cranial crest, the reduction of the distal end of the fibula, the disposition of the distal end of the tibia, and the relation of the astragalus. In some genera there was a bony dermal armor, in some cases developing great spines. The Dinosauria were a polymorphic as well as an extensive group, the limits of which are not settled, owing to the wide range of variation presented by them. They ranged in size from that of the huge Iguanodon down to about two feet. By some they are supposed to have included the remote ancestors of birds; others find in them features that recall mammals, especially pachyderms. The order is by some divided into Dinosauria proper and Compsognathia (which see); it is sometimes ranked as a subfamily of Reptilia, and divided into Sauropoda, Stegosauria, Ornithomoridae, Theropoda, and Heteropoda.

Apical Dinos, or Crater, resting on a stand, or hypocaust. (From "L'Art pour Tous.") dinosaurian (di'nô-sâr'î-an), a. and n. [< Dinosauria + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dinosauria. II. n. One of the Dinosauria. Also deinosaurian.

Dinosaur (di'nô-sâr'us), n. [NL., < Gr. deînô, terrible, mighty, + ôrnîs, a lizard.] The typical genus of Dinosauria. Waldheim, 1848. Also Deinosaur.

dinothere (di'nô-thēr), n. A fossil animal of the genus Dinothereum.

dinotherea, n. Plural of dinothereum. Dinothereidae (di'nô-thēr'î-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dinothereum + -idae.] The family represented by the genus Dinothereum, and commonly referred to the order Proboscidea with the elephants, mastodons, etc. Also Deinotherea.

Dinothereum (di'nô-thēr'î-um), n. [NL., < Gr. deînô, terrible, mighty, + ôrnîs, a wild beast.] 1. A genus of extinct proboscidean quadrupeds of great size, related to the elephants, mammoths, and mastodons. It had (7) incisors in the upper and 2 in the lower jaw, no canines, 2 premolars and 2 molars in each half of each jaw—all in position at once, the premolars replacing milk molars as usual in diphyodont mammals—and enormous lower incisors, turned down or away from the mouth, the end of the under jaw being modified to correspond. There are several species, from the Miocene of Europe and Asia, the best-known of which is D. giganteum, from Epelheim near Mainz, estimated to have been about 18 feet long.

Dinothereum (restored).

2. [i. c.] Pl. dinotherea (-â). An animal of the genus Dinothereum; a dinothere. Also spelled Deinothereum.

dinorid (di-nôr'id), n. An erroneous form of dinorid.

dinome (din'sum), a. [< din + -some.] Full of din or noise; noisy. [Booth.]

Block and staddle ring and reel
WT dinome clamour.

Burns, Scotch Drink.

dint (dint), n. [< ME. dint, dynt, dunt, also dent (whence the other E. form dent, q. v.), < AS. dynt, a blow, = Iscl. dynt, dynta, assimilated dytt, a dint (as a nickname), = Sw. dial. dunt, a stroke. Perhaps akin to L. tendere, beat, stroke, thump: see the verb.] 1. A blow; a stroke.

The Duke had dyed of the dynt duntles anon,
But the souerayn hym-selson was surly enarmyt.
Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), l. 1237.

That mortal dint,
Save he who reigns above, none can resist.
Milton, P. L., ll. 512.

2. A mark made by a blow or by pressure on a surface: now dent.—3. Force; power: now chiefly in the phrase by dint of: as, by dint of argument.

Strong were our sires, and as they fought they writ, Conquering with force of arm and dint of wit.
Dryden, On "The Double Dealer."

And now by dint of fingers and of eyes,
And words repeated after her, he took A lesson in her tongue.
Byron, Don Juan.

Painfully struggling into being, like the other states of the Peninsula, by dint of force, unintermitted warfare with the infidel.
Prescott, Ferd. and Is., Int.

dint (dint), v. t. [< ME. dynten, dunten, strike, beat (not in AS.), = Iscl. dynta, dint, = Sw. dial. dunta, strike, shake; from the noun. See dent, v.] To make a mark or depression on or in by a blow or stroke: now usually dent.

His wounds worker, that with lovely dart
Dinting his breast had bred his restless pains.
Shakespeare, F. Q., VI. x. xi.

dintless (dint'les), a. [< dint + -less.] Without a dint or dent.

Lichen and mosses, . . . meek creatures! the first mercy of the earth, velling with hushed softness its dintless rocks.
Ruskin, Modern Painters, V.

dinumeration (di-nû-mâ-rî'ahon), n. [< L. dinumeratio (-a), a counting over, < dinumerare, pp. dinumeratus, count over, < di for dis, apart, + numerare, count: see number, numerate.] 1. The act of numbering singly. Johnson.—2. In rhet., same as aparithmesis.

di nuovo (dî nwô'vô), [It., < L. de novo, q. v.] In music, anew; again: a direction to repeat.

dinus (di'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. δινος, a whirling, vertigo.] In pathol., vertigo; dizziness.

diobol (di-ob'ol), n. [< Gr. διαβολος, < di, two, + βολος, bolos.] A silver coin of ancient Greece, of the value of two obols. See obol.

dioc. An abbreviation of diocese and diocesan. diocesan (di'ô-sē-an or di'ô-sē-an), a. and n. [< ME. diocesan (n.), < OF. diocésain, F. diocésain = Sp. Pg. It. diocesano, < ML. diocesanus, pertaining to a diocese, < LL. diocesis, a diocese; see diocese.] I. a. Pertaining to a diocese.

The diocesan jurisdiction was helpless without the king's assistance.
Stowe, Const. Hist., 4 ed.

Diocesan courts, the consistorial or consistory courts in the Church of England.

II. a. 1. A bishop as related to his own diocese; one in possession of a diocese and having the ecclesiastical jurisdiction over it.

I have heard it has been advised by a diocesan to his inferior clergy, that they should read some of the most celebrated sermons printed by others.

2. One of the clergy or people in a diocese; a diocesan.

Faithful lovers who . . . are content to rank themselves humble diocesans of old Bishop Valentine.

Lamb, Valentine's Day.

diocese (di'ô-sēs), n. [Formerly less prop. dioces; < ME. diocles, < OF. diocles, diocess, F. diocèse = Pr. diocess, diocess = Sp. diócesis, diócesis = Pg. diocesse, diocesse = It. diocesi = D. diocesis = G. diócesis, < L. diocesis, a governor's jurisdiction, a district, LL. and ML. a bishop's jurisdiction, diocesse, < Gr. δαιοικον, housekeeping, administration, a province, a diocese, < δαειν, keep house, conduct, govern, < δαδ, through, + δαιο, inhabit, dwell, < δαος, a dwelling, a house, = L. vicus, a village (> ult. E. wick, a town), = Skt. vāṇa, a house.] 1. A district or division of a country; a province: now obsolete except when used with reference to Norway, an episcopal diocese (stift) of which, as a geographical division of the country, is sometimes regarded as a province, though it has no provincial civil administration.

Wild boars are no rarity in this diocese, which the Moors hunt and kill in a many pasture.

L. Addison, West Barbary, II.

2. Under the Roman empire after Diocletian and Constantine, a subdivision of a prefecture, comprising a number of provinces; hence, a corresponding extent of territory as an ecclesiastical division, including a number of provinces or eparchies, each province again containing a number of parishes, which themselves finally came to be called dioceses in the following (modern) sense.—3. The district, with its population, falling under the pastoral care of a bishop.

The local compass of his [a bishop's] authority we term a diocese.

Hooker, Ecclies. Polity, vii. 8.

Meletius of Antioch . . . visited the dioceses of Syria, and the several religious persons famous for severe undertakings.

Jor. Taylor, Works (ed. 1828), I. 108.

The boundaries of the kingdom or principality became the boundaries of the bishop's diocese, and, as kingdoms and shires shifted more than bishoprics did, the boundaries of the dioceses became in Britain, as in Gaul, the best guide to the earlier geography of the country.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 142.

diocesanary (di'ô-sē'se-nâr), n. [< diocesse + -an-ry; the term, appar. after that of parishan-ry, ML. parish-en.] One who belongs to a diocese.

They say this unity in the bishop or the rector doth not create any privacy between the parishioners or diocesanary, more than if there were several bishops, or several persons.

Bacon, Works.

diocesan, n. An obsolete form of diocesse.

diocet (di'ôk), n. A name of the crimson-beaked weaver-bird, Quercus sanguinolentus, of Africa. diocetahedral (di'ôk-tē'hē'drāl), a. [< di + octahedral.] In crystal., having the form of an octahedral prism with tetrahedral summits.

Diocetes (di'ôk'ētēs), n. [NL., < Gr. δαιοικον, equiv. to δαειν, a pursuer, < δαειν, pursue.] 1. In entom., a genus of adelphagous beetles, of the family Carabidae.—2. In ornith., a genus of tyrant flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae. The type is D. pyrrholaema of Mexico. Bechstein, 1850.

Diodia (di'ô-dî-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δαιοικον, also diocet, a passage through, < dia, through, + diocet, way; so called because many of the species grow by the waysides.] A genus of decumbent herbs, natural order Bubaceae, natives of the warmer regions of America and Africa. The species are rather pretty trailing shrubs, with small white flowers. The two North American species, D. virginica and D. latifolia, are called Indian-weed.

Diodon (di'ô-don), n. [NL., < Gr. δίοδον, < di, two, + δόν, Ionic form of δόν (δόν) = ML. tooth.] 1. In ichth.: (a) A genus of globe-fishes, of the suborder Symptetracanthi and order Plectognathi. The jaws are tipped with ivory-like enamel instead of teeth; this bone is undivided in each jaw, so that there appears to be a tooth above and another below, whence the name. D. ageris, of the East Indian and South American coasts, is an example. Like the other globe-fishes, it blows itself into a globular shape by swallowing air, and the skin is beset with spiny processes; hence it is known as pervous-fish, sea-cucumber, sea-hedgehog, and prickly globe-fish. (3) [L. c.] A species of the genus Diodon.—2. In ornith., a genus of two-toothed falcons of South America: same as Bidens, Diplodon, or Harporagus. Lesson, 1831.—3. In mammal., a genus of cetaceans: same as Ziphius.—4. In herpet., same as Anodon, 2.

Diodontinae (di-ō-dōn'ti-nē), a. pl. [NL., irreg. < Diodon (t), 1, + -ina.] A subfamily of gymnodont fishes: same as Diodontidae.

diodont (di-ō-dōn't), a. and n. I. a. Having two teeth; specifically, of or pertaining to the Diodontidae.

II. n. A fish of the family Diodontidae.

Diodontidae (di-ō-dōn'ti-dē), a. pl. [NL., < Diodon (t), 1, + -idae.] A family of gymnodont plectognath fishes, named from the genus Diodon, including all the known Diodontidae. The body is covered with long spines often capable of erection, the belly is inflexible, and the dorsal and anal fins are small, posterior, and opposite. The species are mostly inhabitants of tropical seas, although a few extend northward and southward far into the temperate zones; they are generally known as pervous-fishes and globe-fishes.

Diodontinae (di-ō-dōn'ti-nē), a. pl. [NL., < Diodon (t), 1, + -ina.] A subfamily of gymnodont fishes, typified by the genus Diodon; the Diodontidae considered as a subfamily of Tetraodontidae.

diodontoid (di-ō-dōn'toid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Diodontidae or Diodontidae.

II. n. A diodont.

Diodontoidae (di-ō-dōn'toi-dē), a. pl. [NL., < Diodon (t), 1, + -oidae.] In Gill's system of classification, a superfamily of gymnodont plectognath fishes. The technical characters are: no pelvic, a normally developed caudal region; the intermaxillary and dentary bones combined into single entireless arches, the supramaxillary portions extending laterally behind; the ethmoid retracted backward under the frontal; and the postfrontals retracted inward to the sides of the supraorbital and behind the frontals.

Dioecia (di-ō-shē), a. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dioecious: see dioecious.] The twenty-second class of plants in the artificial system of Linnaeus. It comprehends such genera as have male or stamens-bearing flowers on one plant, and female or pistil-bearing flowers on another, as willows.

dioecian, dioecian (di-ō-shēn), a. [As dioecious + -an.] Same as dioecious.

dioecipolygamous (di-ō-shē-pō-lig'g-mus), a. In bot., polygamous with a tendency to dioeciousness, or to the prevalence of flowers of one sex upon individual plants.

dioecious, dioecious (di-ō-shus), a. [< NL. dioecus, < Gr. di-, two-, + oikos, house.] 1. In bot., unisexual, male and female flowers being borne on separate plants, as in the willow, prickly ash, and hemp.—2. Having the flowers unlike on different plants of the same species: used only with modifying prefixes, as androdioecious.

dioecious, when the flowers on some plants are all male and on others all hermaphrodite (a hypothetical case), and gynodioecious, when they are in like manner female and hermaphrodite.—3. In zool., sexually distinct; having the two sexes in different individuals: opposed to monoecious. Also dioecia, dioeci, dioecius.

dioeciously, dioeciously (di-ō-shus-ly), adv. In a dioecious manner; with a tendency to dioeciousness.

The reproductive organs are distributed monoeciously or dioeciously. See Botany (trans.), p. 303.

dioeciousness, dioeciousness (di-ō-shus-nēs), n. The state or quality of being dioecious. Also dioecism, dioecism.

Dioeciousness—self-sterility—the propensity of pollen from another individual over a plant's own pollen. See Botany, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 323.

In many of the plants of this division (Portulacaceae) there is a strong tendency toward dioeciousness in the prothallia, and in the higher genera it becomes the invariable rule. See Botany, p. 323.

dioecism (di-ō-shim), n. [< dioecious + -ism.] Same as dioeciousness.

Diogenes-crab (di-ō-jē-nēs-krah), n. [So called from its choosing a shell for its residence; with allusion to the famous Cynic philosopher Diogenes, who, according to the tradition, chose to live in a tub. The name, Gr. Diogenes, is prop. an adj., Διογενής, Zeus-born, < Zeus (Δις), Zeus (see dolty), + -γενής, -born: see -gen.] A West Indian hermit-crab of the genus Conobita and family Paguridae.

Diogenes-cup (di-ō-jē-nēs-kup), n. The cup-like cavity formed by the palm of the hand, when the fingers are slightly bent, the little and third fingers being drawn over toward the thumb.

Diogenes (di-ō-jē-n'ik), a. [< Diogenes (see Diogenes-crab) + -a.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling Diogenes, a celebrated Greek philosopher of the Cynic school, who flourished in the fourth century B. C. See Cynic, n., 1.

We omit the series of Socratic, or rather Diogenes utterances, not unhappy in their way, whereby the monster, "persuaded into silence," seems soon after to have withdrawn for the night. See Cynic, p. 32.

dioic, dioicous (di-ō-ik, di-ō-ikus), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + oikos, a house; same as dioecious, but imitating the Gr. spelling.] Same as dioecious.

Diomedes (di-ō-mē-dēs), n. [NL., < Diomedes, Gr. Διομήδης, a famous hero at the siege of Troy, lit. Zeus-counseled, < Zeus (Δις), Zeus, + μήδης, pl. μήδεις, counsels.] The typical genus of the subfamily Diomedinae, containing most of the albatrosses. D. exilis and D. brachyura are characteristic examples. See out under albatross.

Diomedinae (di-ō-mē-dē-i-nē), a. pl. [NL., < Diomedes + -ina.] A subfamily of birds, of the family Procellariidae, including the albatrosses. They are characterized by having the hind toe rudimentary and the nostrils disconnected from each other, one on each side of the base of the upper mandible. Diomedes is the typical genus, and others, as Phaethria, are recognized by some naturalists. See albatross.

Dion (di-ōn), n. See Dioön.

Dionaea (di-ō-nē), n. [NL., fem. of L. Dionaeus, < Gr. Διοναίος, pertaining to Dione, fem. Διώνη, Aphrodite, < Διώνη, Dione, the mother of Aphrodite by Zeus, later applied to Aphrodite herself, < Zeus (Δις), Zeus: see Zeus, dolty.] 1. A genus of plants, natural order Droseraceae. Only one species is known, D. muscipula (Venus's fly-trap), a native of the sandy savannas of the Carolinas and Flor.

Venus's Fly-trap (Dionaea muscipula). (From Gay's "Genera of the Plants of the United States.")

ida. It has a rosette of root-leaves, from which rises a naked scape bearing a corymb of rather large white flowers. The leaves have a dilated petiole and a slightly stalked 3-lobed lamina or appendage with three very delicate hairs and a fringe of stout marginal bristles on each lobe. The hairs are remarkably irritable, and when touched by a fly or other insect the lobes of the leaf suddenly close on the insect and capture it. This is followed by the copious secretion of an acid liquid for the digestion of the prey, and by its absorption. This may be repeated several times by the same leaf.

2. In entom., a genus of dipterous insects. See ecoidy, 1830. Also Dionaea.

Diogenes (di-ō-jim), n. [< Gr. Διογενής, with two names, < di-, two-, + oikos, house, a name: see oym.] A name consisting of two terms; a binomial name in zoology, as Homo sapiens. Caus.

dionymal (di-on'i-mal), a. [As dionym + -al.] Of or pertaining to a dionym; binomial; binominal.

The binomial (or dionymal) system. J. A. Allen, The Ark, I. 322.

Dionysia (di-ō-nis'i-ā), n. pl. [L., < Gr. Διονυσία (sc. ἑορταὶ, offerings), neut. pl. of Διονυσίος, pertaining to Dionysus; see Dionysus.] In classical antiquity, the orgiastic and dramatic festivals celebrated periodically in various parts of Greece, in honor of Dionysus or Bacchus. The most important of these festivals, in the historic period, were those of Attica, which were four in number, celebrated annually: the Bural or Lesser Dionysia, the Lemnia, the Anthesteria, and the Dionysia in the City, or Greater Dionysia. The Lesser Dionysia were a vintage-festival, celebrated through the rural demes in the month of Poseidon (December), with universal merriment and freedom from restraint, extended even to slaves. Plays were performed during this festival, and from its characteristic songs and jests comedy was developed. The Greater Dionysia were observed at Athens in the second half of March, with a grand procession, a cat chorus of boys, and the production in competition at the expense of the state, in the Dionysia theatron in honor of the god, of the comedies and tragedies of which those surviving constitute our most precious treasures of ancient literature. See Bacchus, Lemnia, Anthesteria, choragus, and choragus.

Dionysiac (di-ō-nis'i-ak), a. [L. Dionysiacus, < Gr. Διονυσιακός, < Διονυσία, Dionysia; see Dionysia, Dionysus.] In Gr. myth., of or pertaining to the festivals called Dionysia, in honor of Dionysus or Bacchus, the god of wine; Bacchic.

It [the Bacchic] is a magnificent play, alone among extant Greek tragedies in picturesque splendour, and in that sustained glow of Dionysiac enthusiasm to which the keen irony lends the strength of contrast. See Ecce, Brit., VIII. 678.

Dionysiac amphora or vase. Same as Bacchic amphora or vase. See Bacchic.

Dionysian (di-ō-nis'i-an), a. [< Gr. Διονυσιακός, pertaining to Dionysus (as a proper name, L. Dionysius), < Διόνυσος, Dionysus: see Dionysus.] 1. Same as Dionysiac.

The Dionysian route and processions. C. O. Miller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 309.

2. Pertaining to or characteristic of Dionysus the Elder or Dionysius the Younger, tyrants of Syracuse (about 405–343 B. C.), both notorious for cruelty, but especially the former.

He . . . [Francis] lived a life of republican simplicity, and punished with Dionysian severity the slightest want of respect. See Ecce, Brit., IX. 621.

3. Pertaining to the abbot Dionysius Exiguus, who, in the sixth century, introduced the present vulgar reckoning of the years.—Dionysian period, a period of 532 Julian years, at the end of which full moons fall on the same days of the year. It was invented for the purpose of computing the time of Easter.

Dionysius's ear. See ear.

Dionysus (di-ō-nis'us), n. [L., also written Dionysos, < Gr. Διονυσος, the earlier name of Bacchus: see Bacchus.] In Gr. myth., the youthful and beautiful god of wine and the drama. Also called Bacchus. See Bacchus.

Dioön (di-ō-on), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + oion = L. ovum, an egg.] A cyceadaceous genus of plants, of which there are only two species, natives of tropical Mexico. The stem is very short and stout, with a crown of large, rigid, and spine-tipped pinnate leaves. The female cone is of the size of a child's head, each scale bearing two seeds as large as chestnuts. The seeds of D. edulis yield a kind of arrowroot. Also Dion.

Diodonites (di-ō-dōn'i-tēs), n. [NL., < Dioecia + -ites.] The generic name of a fossil plant belonging to the cyceads, occurring in numerous localities in the Triassic and Jurassic of Europe. The genus Diodonites, as instituted by Bornemann, consists largely of species previously assigned by authors to Pterophyllum.

Diophantine (di-ō-fan'tin), a. [L., < L. Diophantus, Gr. Διοφάντης, a proper name, + -an.] Of or pertaining to Diophantus of Alexandria, a celebrated Greek arithmetician, who flourished in the fourth century.—Diophantine analysis, indeterminate analysis: a method of solving Diophantine problems, namely, of solving indeterminate algebraic equations, the solutions being rational numbers. The method consists in introducing an equation involving an indeterminate coefficient, in such a way that the square of one of the unknowns may be eliminated. It therefore depends upon the ingenuity and experience of the calculator. The following is an example: Required to separate a given square number, N, into the sum of two squares. Let a be one of these squares, and let the root of the other be x—N, where a is indeterminate. Then the sum of the two squares will be  $(1 + a^2)x^2 - 2ax + N$ . Since this is equal to N, we have  $(1 + a^2)x^2 - 2ax + N = N$ , which is rational.

diophtalmus (di-of-thal'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + ophthalmos, eye.] Same as bimocular, 3.

diophtalmite, diophtalmism. See diophtalmite, etc. Diophtalmium (di-op-lth-thi'm), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + ophthalmos, eye (as those possessed by animals for defense or attack), + diophtalmos, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil sirenians from South Carolina, characterized by the presence of two incisors, whence the name.

diopside (di-op'sid or -sid), n. [Gr. diopside, a view through (< di, through, + opsis, a view), + -idos.] A variety or subspecies of pyroxene, containing as bases chiefly calcium and magnesium, with more or less iron. It occurs in prismatic crystals, of a vitreous luster, and of a pale green or a greenish, or yellowish-white color. Fine specimens come from the Menné Alp, in the Ala valley in Piedmont. Also called oklaite and menziesite.

Diopsis (di-op'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + opsis, view. Cf. diopside.] 1. In entom., a genus of dipterous insects, of the family Muscidae, or flies. It is characterized by the immense prolongation of the sides of the head, which thus appears as if it were furnished with long horns knobbed at the end. All the known species are from tropical regions of the old world. 2. A genus of turbellarian worms.

A species of Diopsis.

diopside (di-op'sis), n. [F. diopside, < Gr. di, through, + opside, later form of opsis, view; cf. opside, to be seen.] Emerald copper ore; silicate of copper, a translucent mineral, occurring crystallized in six-sided prisms.

dioptr (di-op'tér), n. [Also, as L., dioptra, < Gr. dioptra, a leveling instrument consisting of a plank turning through a semicircle on a stand, and provided with sights at the two ends and a water-level, < di, through, + optra, < optra, in optra, see, < optra, optic, etc.: see optics.] 1. An ancient form of theodolite.—2. The allude or index arm of a graduated circle.—3. An instrument used in craniometry for obtaining projections of the skull.—4. A dioptric.

dioptra, n. Plural of dioptron. dioptrate (di-op'trát), a. [< Gr. di, through, + optra, < optra, in optra, see (see dioptr), + -ate.] In entom., divided by a transverse partition, as the compound eyes of certain aquatic beetles; divided by a transverse line, as the central spot or pupil of an ocellate or eye-like mark.

dioptric (di-op'trik), a. and n. [< Gr. dioptrikos, pertaining to the use of the dioptr, < dioptra, dioptr: see dioptr.] I. a. 1. Affording a medium for the sight; assisting vision in the view of distant objects.

View the asperities of the moon through a dioptric glass, and venture at the proportion of her hills by their shadows. Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism, II. 12. 2. Pertaining to dioptries, or the science of refracted light.

These dioptric images, when formed by lenses free from spherical and chromatic aberration, are geometrically correct pictures. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 187.

Dioptric system, in lighthouses, a mode of lighting in which the illumination is produced by a central lamp, the rays from which are transmitted through a combination of lenses surrounding it. Also called the refracting system.

Section of Fresnel's Dioptric Light.

The latter being measured positively in the direction away from the source of parallel rays entering the lens; so that a convex lens with a focal length of half a meter would have a power of 2 dioptries, and a concave lens with a focal length of 250 millimeters would have a power of -4 dioptries.

Owing principally to differences in the length of the inch in various countries, this method (the inch being used as the unit) had great inconveniences, and is now giving place to a universal system, in which the unit is the refractive power of a lens whose focal length is one meter. This unit is called a dioptrie (usually written "D").

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 572.

dioptrical (di-op'tri-kal), a. Same as dioptric. dioptrically (di-op'tri-kal-l), adv. By refraction.

And now that it has been shown that these images are not formed dioptrically, but are the result of numerous "diffraction-species," it is impossible to entertain the same confidence as before. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 277.

dioptries (di-op'triks), n. [Pl. of dioptrie (see -ies), after Gr. dioptra, the science of dioptries.] That part of optics which treats of the refraction of light passing through different media, as air, water, or glass, and especially through lenses. The term is now not much used by scientific writers, the phenomena to which it refers being treated under the general head of refraction (which see). See also lens, light, and optics. Also called ametastasia.

dioptron (di-op'tron), n.; pl. dioptra (-tri). [< Gr. dioptron: see dioptr.] A surgical speculum.

dioptry (di-op'tri), n. A dioptrie.

diorama (di-ô-râ'm), n. [< Gr. as if **diopayma*, < diopay, see through, < di, through, + opay, see. Cf. panorama.] 1. A spectacular painting, or a connected series of paintings, intended for exhibition to spectators in a darkened room, in a manner to produce by optical illusions an appearance of reality. The paintings are so executed and arranged that a variety of effects may be induced by varying the direction, intensity, and color of the light; one of the most notable of these effects coming from light transmitted through the picture itself, which is painted in transparent coloring on a thin fabric. Different scenes may be painted on the two faces of the fabric, and a change from one to the other may be made by altering the source of the illumination. A daylight scene may be thus changed with wonderful realism to one by moonlight, or a desert place may become all at once peopled by a busy crowd. The diorama was devised in 1822 by Daguerre (the chief inventor of photography) and Bouton.

2. A building in which dioramic paintings are exhibited.

dioramic (di-ô-râ'm'ik), a. [< diorama + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a diorama.

diorism (di-ô-rism), n. [< Gr. diopayma, division, distinction, < diopay, divide, distinguish, draw a boundary through, < di, through, + opay, draw a boundary, < opay, a boundary: see horizon.] 1. Distinction; definition. [Rare.]

To eat things sacrificed to idols is one mode of idolatry; but, by a prophetic diorism, it signifies idolatry in general. Dr. H. More, Epistles to the Seven Churches, p. 72.

2. In math., a statement of the conditions under which the problem to which it belongs is soluble.

dioristic, dioristical (di-ô-ris'tik, -ti-kal), a. [< Gr. diopayma, distinctive, < diopay, distinguish: see diorism.] Distinguishing; defining. [Rare.]

dioristically (di-ô-ris'ti-kal-l), adv. So as to distinguish; by definition. [Rare.]

Ye are not so pure and clean as ye ought to be, and free from the lusts of the flesh; which vice is here noted by Nicolaitism dioristically, as idolatry in general before by eating things sacrificed to idols.

Dr. H. More, Epistles to the Seven Churches, p. 72.

diorite (di-ô-rit), n. [So called because formed of distinct portions; irreg. < Gr. diopayma, separate, distinguish (see diorism), + -ite.] The name given by Haüy to a rock included among those varieties which had before that time been generally designated by the name greenstone. Diorite consists essentially of a crystalline-granular aggregate of a tricolored felspar and hornblende, in very varying proportions, with which are frequently associated magnetite and apatite, and sometimes mica. This rock has usually a thoroughly crystalline structure. Many of the rocks called by the name of diorite are, in all probability, altered basalts; some, however, may have resulted from the alteration of andesites, and even of gabbros. In the case of diorite, the alteration has proceeded further than it has in the diabases and melaphyres. See greenstone and diabase.

dioritic (di-ô-rit'ik), a. [< diorite + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of diorite.

diorthosis (di-ô-rthô'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. diopayma, a making straight, as the setting of a limb, amendment, correction, < diopay, make straight, < di, through, + opay, make straight, < opay, straight.] 1. In surg., the reduction of a fracture or dislocation, or the restoration of crooked or distorted limbs to their proper shape.—2. A recension or critical edition of a literary work.

diorthotic (di-ô-rthot'ik), a. [< Gr. diopayma, corrective, < diopay, correction: see diorthosis.] 1. Relating to the amendment or correction of texts; corrective.

No sooner had Scaliger placed himself by common consent at the head of textual criticism, than he took leave for ever of diorthisic criticism. Quarterly Rev.

2. In surg., relating to diorthisis.

Dioscorides (di-os-kô-rî's), n. [NL., in honor of Dioscorides, a famous Greek physician and botanist.] A large genus of twining plants, the type of the natural order Dioscoreaceae. There are about 150 species, belonging chiefly to the warmer parts of America and Asia. They have fleshy tuberculous roots, containing a large amount of starch, and several species are extensively cultivated for food in many lands.

Chinese or Japanese Yam (Dioscorea Batatas).

1. Female flowers and fruit. 2. Male flowers. (From Le Moine and Decandolle's "Traité général de Botanique.") ool and subtropical regions. The principal species thus cultivated, commonly known as yams, are D. sativa, D. esculenta, D. alata, and the Chinese or Japanese yam, D. Batatas. See yam.

Dioscoreaceae (di-os-kô-rî-s'ê-s), n. pl. [NL., < Dioscorea + -aceae.] A natural order of endogenous plants distinguished by their ribbed, reticulately veined leaves, tuberous roots or knotted rootstocks, twining stems, and inconspicuous dioecious flowers. It includes 8 genera and about 150 species, and is represented in the United States by a single species, Dioscorea villosa.

dioscoreaceous (di-os-kô-rî-s'ê-shi-us), a. Belonging to or having the characters of the Dioscoreaceae.

dioscorein (di-os-kô-rî-in), n. [< Dioscorea + -in.] A precipitate formed by adding water to the tincture of the roots of Dioscorea villosa, used medicinally by eclectic physicians.

Dioscuri (di-os-kû-ri), n. pl. [< Gr. diopayma, later and Ionic form of diopayma, pl. (rarely in sing. diopayma), < di, gen. of Zeus, + opay, Ionic amphos, a son, a boy, lad.] In Gr. myth., the twin sons of Zeus and Leda, Castor and Polydeuces or Pollux, warrior gods, and tutelary protectors of sailors. At a comparatively late date the Dioscuri were partly confused with the Cabiri.

To the Dioscuri, who always retained very much of their divine nature, belongs a perfectly unblemished youthful beauty, an equally slender and powerful shape, and, as an almost never-failing attribute, the half-oval form of the hat, or at least hair lying close at the back of the head, but projecting in thick curls around the forehead and temples. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archaeol. (trans.), § 414.

Dioscurian (di-os-kû-ri-an), a. [< Dioscuri + -an.] Pertaining to the Dioscuri.

Diosma (di-os-mâ), n. [NL., < Gr. di, divine, + opay, odor.] A genus of heath-like rutaceous plants, of about a dozen species, natives of South Africa. The foliage is resinous-dotted, and they all diffuse a strong and generally disagreeable odor. Several species are occasionally cultivated in greenhouses for their white or pinkish flowers.

diosmoids (di-os-môis), n. [< NL. diosmoids, q. v.] Same as diosmoids.

diosmoids (di-os-mô'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. di, through, + opay, a thrusting, pushing, < idriv, push: see osmosis.] In physics, the transudation of a fluid through a membrane; transudation through imperceptible openings. The way in which the maternal and fetal circulations mingle in the placenta is an example of diosmosis. See osmosis, osmosis, endosmosis.

diosmotic (di-os-mot'ik), a. [< diosmoids (-môis) + -ic.] Pertaining to diosmosis; osmotic.

Diospyros (di-os-pli-ro-s), n. [NL., < L. diospyros (Pliny), < Gr. diopayma, a certain plant, i. e., Asi, rup, lit. Zeus's wheat; Asi, gen. of Zeus, Zeus (see Zeus, deity); rup, wheat.] A large genus of trees and shrubs, of the natural order Ebenaceae, natives of the warmer regions of the world, but belonging for the most part to Asia and Mauritania.

Flower and Fruit of Diospyros (Diospyros Virginiana).

Of the 120 species, only two are American, of which one is the common predecessor of the United States. D. pinnata, sometimes called galeata. The wood is hard and heavy, and many species yield woods that are valuable for carving, furniture-making, etc. Ebony is the heart-wood of several species, the best and most costly, with the blackest and finest grain, being obtained from D. reticulata of Mauritius and D. africana of Caylon. D. guianensis of Caylon yields calanander-wood, and D. Kuroki the marble-wood of the Andaman Islands. D. Kakhi, the Chinese or Japanese persimmon, is cultivated for its fruit, which resembles the plum in appearance and flavor, and has been introduced into southern Europe and the United States. D. Lotus of southern Europe has been supposed to be the lotus of the ancients, but its fruit is hardly edible. It is used as a remedy for diarrhea. The fruits of most of the species are exceedingly astringent when immature, owing to the amount of tannic acid which they contain.

diotheism (di-oth'e-ism), n. [Irreg. for **di-theism*.] (L. Gr. di-the-ia, with two volitions (< Gr. di-, two-, + the-ia, will), + -ism.) In theol., the doctrine that Christ during his earthly life possessed two wills, a human and a divine; opposed to monothelism. Also dyotheism. [Rare.]

diothelism (di-oth'e-lism), n. [Irreg. for **diothelism*; as diothelism + -ism.] One who holds to the doctrine of diotheism. Also dyothelism.

dioxia (di-ok-si'a), n. [< Gr. di-oxia, i. e., di' oxia, in full di' oxia oxia oxia oxia (cf. diapason, diapente, etc.), oxia, gen. pl. of oxia, fem. of oxia, sharp.] In Gr. music, the interval of a fifth; later called diapente (which see).

dioxid (di-ok-sid), n. [< di- + oxid.] An oxid consisting of one atom of a metal and two atoms of oxygen. Also written, erroneously, dioxid.—Carbon dioxide. Same as carbonic acid (which see, under carbonic).

dioxyc. [< di- + oxy (gen).] A chemical prefix signifying that the compound to which it is prefixed contains either two oxygen atoms or two oxygen atoms additional to another compound. Thus, succinic acid has the formula  $C_4H_4O_4$ , and dioxysuccinic acid has the formula  $C_4H_4O_6$ .

dip (dip), v.; pret. and pp. dipped or dip't, pp. dipping. [Early mod. E. also dipte, dypte (also dial. dyb: see dyb); < ME. dippen, dyppen, < AS. dyppan, dyppan (pret. dypte, pp. dypped) (= Dan. dyppe), dip, plunge, immerse, a secondary form, orig. dyppan (equiv. to O. North. dypan, baptize, = OS. dypan = D. doopen = LG. doopen = OHG. tuofen, MHG. tuofen, G. taufen = Sw. döpa = Dan. döbe = Goth. daupjan, all in sense of 'baptize,' the orig. and lit. sense 'dip' being found only in OHG., MHG., and Goth.), a causative verb, < dypp, Goth. dypps, etc., deep: see deep. Related words are dop, dopper, dap, dab, etc., and perhaps dimple.] I. trans. 1. To plunge or immerse temporarily in water or other liquid, or into something containing it; lower into and then raise from water or other liquid; as, to dip a person in baptism; to dip a boat's oars; to dip one's hands into water.

The priest shall dip his finger in the blood. Lev. iv. 4. The basin then being brought up to the bishop, he often dipped a large lettuce into it, and several times sprinkled all the people. Picoche, Description of the East, II. 1. 18.

2. To lower and raise as if in temporary immersion; hence, to perform by a downward and an upward movement; as, to dip a flag in salutation; the falcon dipped his wings for flight; to dip a courtesy.—3. To raise or take up by a dipping action; lift by bailing or scooping; as, to dip water out of a boat; to dip out soup with a ladle; to dip up sand with a bucket.—4. To immerse or submerge partly; plunge or sink to some extent into water; hence, to plunge, as a person, into anything that involves activity or effort, as difficulties or entanglements; engage; entangle.

He was a little dip in the rebellion of the commons. Dryden, Fables.

In the green waves did the low bank dip its fresh and green grass-covered daisied lip. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 408.

5. To engage as a pledge; generally used for the first mortgage. Latham.

Put out the principal in trusty hands, Live on the sea, and never dip thy lands. Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires.

6. To plunge into; begin to sink into or be immersed in. [Rare.]

But are he [the sword Escalibur] dip the surface, rocean arm Clothed in white amble, mytic, wonderful, And caught him by the hilt. Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

7. To affect as if by immersion; moisten; wet.

A cold shuddering dew Dips me all o'er, as when the wrath of Jove Speaks thunder. Addison, Cato, I. 308.

We saw two boats crossed and the gulls were to be pulled on shore by the hands. . . . Among others I saw the ministers . . . dipped. Pope, Diary, May 14, 1693.

Dipping the axle. See axle.—To dip axle, to take mud by dipping a stick into it and rubbing it upon the teeth and gums. [Southern U. S.]

Sam Upshook smoked his pipe, and Peggy dipped snuff, but Dyer declined joining them in using tobacco. The Century, XXXI. 563.

To dip the flag. See flag.
II. intrans. 1. To plunge into water or other liquid and quickly emerge.

Unharm'd the water-towl may dip In the Volcanian mere. Macaulay, Horatius, vii.

2. To plunge one's finger or hand, or a dipper, ladle, or the like, into anything; make a transitory plunge or entrance; hence, to engage or interest one's self temporarily or to a slight extent; with in or into; as, to dip into speculation.

Who can call him his friend, That dips in the same dish? Shak., T. of A., III. 2.

I dipped among the worst and stains chose? Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, II. 38.

We dip in all That treats of whatsoever is. Tennyson, Princess, II.

A blasphemy so like these Molinists', I must suspect you dip into their books. Browning, Ring and Book, II. 39.

3. To incline downward; sink, as if below the horizon; as, the magnetic needle dips; specifically, in geol., said of strata which are not horizontal.

The sun's rim dips, the stars rush out. Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, III. Where the steep upland dips into the marsh. Lowell, Under the Willows.

dip (dip), n. [< dip, v.] 1. The act of dipping; immersion for a short time in water or other liquid; a plunge; a bath; as, the dip of the oars; a dip in the sea.

The dip of the wild fowl, the rustling of trees. Whittier, Bridal of Pennacook, I.

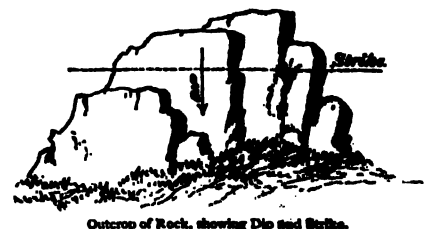

2. That which is dipped; specifically, a candle made by dipping a wick repeatedly in melted tallow.

He gazed around, And holds up his dip of sixteen to the pound. Berkeley, Ingold's Legends, I. 55.

It is a solitary purser's dip, as they are termed at sea, emitting but feeble rays. Murray, Snarleygow, I. xix.

3. The act of dipping up, as with a ladle or dipper; as, to take a dip from the bowl.—4. Inclination downward; a sloping; a direction below a horizontal line; depression.

Ev'n to the last dip of the vanishing sail She watch'd it. Tennyson, Enoch Arden. Specifically—(a) In geol., the angle which a stratum of Outcrop of Rock, showing Dip and Strike.

rock makes with a horizontal plane. The dip is the complement of the strike or underlay. See these words.

If a stratum or bed of rock, instead of being quite level, be inclined to one side, it is said to dip; the point of the compass to which it is inclined is said to be the point of dip, and the degree of deviation from a level or horizontal line is called the amount of dip.

Lowell, Manual of Geol., v. (b) In mining: (1) A heading driven to the dip in mines in which the beds of coal have a steep inclination. Also called dip-head. (2) Rarely, a heading driven to the rise. [North. Staffordshire, Eng.] (c) In telep., the distance from a point in a wire midway between two adjacent supports to the middle point of a straight line joining the points on these supports to which the wire is stretched. (d) A correction to be applied to the altitudes of heavenly bodies observed at sea, varying according to the height of the observer's eye.

5. Any liquid into which something is to be dipped.

The bronzing dip may be prepared by dissolving in 1 gal. hot water 3 lb. each perchloride of iron and perchloride of copper. The metal should not be allowed to remain in this dip any longer than is necessary to produce the desired colour. Worksop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 244. Specifically—(a) Drawn butter, or milk thickened with sour, served with toast. (b) A sauce served with puddings. [Local, U. S.]

6. A pickpocket. [Thieves' slang.]—Dip of the horizon, the angular amount by which the horizon line lies below the level of the eye. It is due to the convexity of the earth, and is somewhat diminished by the refraction of light. The figure gives an exaggerated representation of the phenomenon, on the left without refraction and on the right with it.—Dip of the needle, the angle which the magnetic needle, freely poised on its center of gravity, and symmetrically formed in both its arms, makes with the plane of the horizon. It is otherwise termed the inclination of the needle.

In the United States the dip of the needle varies from 45° to 70° at the magnetic poles it is 90°, and on the magnetic equator it is 0°. Direction of the dip, the point of the compass toward which a stratum of rock is inclined.

dipaschal (di-pas'kal), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + pascha, passover: see paschal.] Including two passovers. Carpenter.

dip-bucket (dip'buk't), a. A bucket contrived to turn and sink, or pour out readily, used on shipboard and in wells.

dipchick (dip'chik), n. [< dip + chick; equiv. to dabchick, q. v.] Same as dabchick. Curlew.

dip-circle (dip'ser'kl), a. A form of dipping-compass (which see).

One of the snow-houses (built not far from the observatory) was designed for the dip-circle, and the other for the declinator. C. F. Hall, Polar Expedition, p. 212.

Dipetidae (di-pet'i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Dipetis + -idae.] A family of xiphosurous mesozoic crustaceans, represented by the genus Dipetis, of Carboniferous age, having a discoidal elliptical body with a smooth abdomen differentiated from the cephalic shield.

Dipetis (di-pet'i-s), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + petis, a shield.] The typical genus of Dipetidae. D. dipetis is an example.

dipenthemimeres (di-pen-them'im'er-es), n. [< Gr. di-penthemimeres, < di-, two-, + penthemimeres, penthemimeres: see penthemimeres.] In anc. pros., a verse consisting of two penthemimeres, or groups of five half-feet (two and a half feet) each; as, for example, a line composed of a dactylic pentameter and an iambic monometer hypercatalectic, — — — — — | — — — — —.

dipetalous (di-pet'a-lus), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + petalon, a leaf (mod. a petal), + -ous.] In bot., having two petals.

di petto (di pet'to). [It.: di, < L. de, from; petto, < L. pectus, breast: see pectoral.] In music, with the natural voice, as opposed to falsetto.

dip-head (dip'hed), n. Same as dip, 4 (b) (1).

It frequently happens that the dip-head level intersects the cutters in its progress at a very oblique angle. Urry, Dict., III. 222.

diphenic (di-fen'ik), a. [< di- + phenic.] Used in the phrase diphenic acid, an oxidation product ( $C_{14}H_{10}O_4$ ) of phenanthrene, one of the constituents of coal-tar.

diphenylamine (dif-fen'il'min), n. [< di- + phenyl + amine.] A crystalline substance,  $(C_6H_5)_2NH$ , having an agreeable odor and weakly basic properties, prepared by the dry distillation of rosaniline blue, or by heating aniline hydrochloride and aniline together. It is used in the preparation of various dye-stuffs, and as a reagent in microchemical analysis for the detection of minute quantities of nitrates and nitrites, which yield with it a dark-blue color.—Diphenylamine-blue. Same as spirit-blue.

diphrelatic (dif-fel'at'ik), a. [< Gr. diphrelatikos, a chariot-driver, < diphros, a chariot-board, the chariot itself, so called because it accommodated two (the driver and his master), for di-dipros, bearing two, < di-, two-, + dipros, < diphros = E. bear].] Of or pertaining to chariot-driving.

diphtheria (dif-er'ip-the'ri-a), n. [NL. (so called with reference to the leathery nature of the membrane formed), < Gr. diphthera, a prepared hide, skin, piece of leather, perhaps < diphros, soften, knead till soft, akin to L. dipere, knead, make supple, tan leather.] An infectious disease, characterized by the formation over the affected and inflamed parts of a firm whitish or grayish pellicle, or false membrane (which is removed with difficulty and leaves a raw surface), and by general prostration. It is not infrequently followed by more or less extended paralysis. The air-passages of the head are the most frequent seat of the diphtheritic membrane, although it may appear on other mucous surfaces and in wounds. The disease is very frequently fatal, and its ravages are extended by filth. Also diphtheria.

being twice active, with an intervening period of rest. It occurs in the scapulae of certain genera of Scapularia, in which the scapulae escape without cilia from the apertures, and come to rest in a chamber, each forming a cell-wall. After some hours of rest the protoplasma of each spore escapes from its cell-wall, acquires cilia, and enters upon a period of active movement.

diplomatian (dip-lan-id'ian), a. [Gr. diplomat, double, + anti, against, + eidō, form, image.] Showing two images, one reversed and the other direct: applied to a telescope proposed in 1778 by Jéaurat, to be used in taking transits, the coincidence of the two images serving in place of a transit over an illuminated wire. The difficulty of the execution of such an instrument are, however, far greater than those of illuminating a wire.

Diplarthra (dip-lār'thrā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of diparthrus: see diparthrus.] Diparthrus mammals; those hoofed quadrupeds which exhibit or are characterized by diplarthrium. They are the artiodactyla and the perissodactyla, or the Ungulata in a proper restricted sense, collectively distinguished from the Taxopoda (which see).

diplarthrium (dip-lār'thrism), n. [Gr. diparthrus + -ism.] The quality or condition of being diplarthrous; the alternation of the several bones of one row of carpals or tarsals with those of the other row respectively, instead of that linear arrangement of the respective bones of both rows which constitutes taxopody (which see); so called because each bone of one row interlocks with two bones of the other row.

Diplarthrium appears in that foot before it does in the fore foot, as in the Proboidea.

diplarthrous (dip-lār'thrus), a. [NL. diparthrus, Gr. diplomat, double, + arthron, joint.] Doubly articulated, as a bone of one row of carpal or tarsal bones with two bones of the other row; characterized by or exhibiting diplarthrium; not taxopodous: as, a diparthrous carpus or tarsus; a diparthrous ungulate mammal.

The conversion of a taxopod into a diparthrous ungulate.

diplasmaemus (di-plā-si-as'mus), n. [NL., Gr. diplasma, a doubling, as of a letter or word, + emus, double, + emus, double: see diplasia.] 1. A figure of orthography, consisting in writing a letter double which is usually written single, as, in Greek ροσος for ροσ.—2. In rhet., repetition of a word or name for the sake of emphasis: as, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets," Mat. xxiii. 37. Also called epitaxis.

diplasic (di-plas'ik), a. [Gr. diplasios, double, + as, two, + plasis, fold, connected with plōs, and ult. with E. full, fold.] Double; twofold; specifically, in anc. pros., constituting the proportion of two to one: as, the diplasic ratio (of thesis and arsis); characterized by such a proportion of thesis and arsis: as, diplasic rhythm; a diplasic foot; the diplasic class (of feet). The diplasic class of feet comprises those feet in which the thesis or metrically accented part (called by many the arsis) has double the length of the arsis or metrically unaccented part (called by many the thesis). The diplasic feet are (1) the iambic foot (equal to  $\cup$  or  $\cup$ ), the trocheic, trochee, and iambus, and (2) the hexameter foot (equal to  $\cup$  or  $\cup$ ), the Ionic a major, the Ionic a minor, Molossus, and chorambus.

The diplasic ratio answers to our common time.

J. Hadley, Essay, p. 28.

diplasion (di-plā'si-on), n. [Gr. diplasion, neut. of diplasio, double: see diplasic.] 1. In anc. Gr. music, a triple rhythm in which there was an alternation of tones whose durations were as two and one respectively.—2. In medieval music, the interval of an octave. See diapason.—3. A form of pianoforte with two keyboards, used in the eighteenth century.

Diplax (di-plaks), n. [NL., Gr. diplax, twofold, + as, two, + plax, fold; cf. diplasia.] 1. In entom., a genus of dragon-flies of the family Libellulidae.—2. A genus of rotifers or wheel-animalcules. P. H. Gosse.

diple (di-plē), n. [Gr. diple, a critical mark (as in def.), prop. fem. of diplos, contr. form of diplōs; double: see diplōs.] In paleog., a critical mark like a T or A laid on its side ( $\tau$ ,  $\rho$ ), used as a mark of a paragraph, the change from one speaker to another in a drama, different readings, rejection of a reading, etc.

diplasia (di-plā'si-a), n. [NL., Gr. di-, two, + plasis, a stroke.] In anatol., paralysis of corresponding parts on the two sides of the body, as of the two arms or of the two sides of the face.

diplasia (di-plā'si-a), a. [Gr. diplasia + -ia.] Pertaining to or of the nature of diplasia.—Diplasia contraction, contraction which, when the anode of a galvanic circuit is applied to the mastoid process and the large cathode is placed between the shoulder-blades, have in some cases been seen in the muscles of the arm on the side opposite that to which the anode is applied.

diploidoscope (di-plō'idō-skōp), n. [Irreg. Gr. diplōs, double, + eidō, appearance, + skopos, view.] An instrument for indicating the passage of the sun or a star over the meridian by the coincidence of two images of the object, the one formed by single and the other by double reflection. It consists of an equilateral hollow prism, two of whose sides are silvered on the inside so as to be mirrors, while the third is formed of glass. The prism is adjusted so that one of the silvered sides shall be exactly in the plane of the meridian, and the transparent side toward the object. So long as the object has not reached the meridian, the image produced by that portion of the rays reflected directly from the glass surface, and that produced by the rays transmitted through the glass to the silvered side, reflected from it to the other, and thence through the glass, are not coincident, but gradually approach as the sun or star approaches the meridian, until they exactly coincide at the instant the center of the object is on the meridian; then an eye stationed at the side of the prism and looking toward the transparent side sees only one object.

Dipleura (di-plō'rā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of dipleurus, Gr. di-, two, + pleura, side. Cf. dipleuric.] In morphol., those organic forms which are diploural: distinguished from Tetrapleura.

Haeckel again divides these, according to the number of antimeres, into Tetrapleura and Dipleura.

Encyc. Brit., XVI. 844.

diploural (di-plō'rāl), a. [As dipleur-ic + -al.] In morphol., symploural with only two antimeres; dipleuric. Haeckel.

Dipleurobranchia (di-plō-rō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. di-, two, + pleura, side, + brachia, gills.] A superfamily of nudibranchiate gastropods, having foliaceous branchiae situated in a fold on each side, and no shell, and containing the families Phyllididae and Pleurophylididae, which are thus contrasted with Monoplobranchia. The group is also called Infrobranchiata or Hypobranchiata.

dipleurobranchiate (di-plō-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. [Gr. Dipleurobranchia + -ate.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Dipleurobranchia. diplex (di-plēks), a. [Gr. di-, two, + plex, in (duplex); a distinctive var. of Diplex.] Double: applied to a method of transmitting two messages in the same direction and at the same time over a single telegraph-line.

The terms contraplex and diplex are here applied as specific names for designating clearly the way in which the particular simultaneous double transmission to which we wish to refer is effected. Thus, for instance, two messages may be sent over a single wire in the same or in opposite directions, and when we do not care to particularize either, we simply allude to them under the more common generic name of duplex transmission, which includes both. When, however, we wish to speak of either method by itself, we use the term diplex for simultaneous transmission in the same direction, and contraplex for that in opposite directions.

diplobacteria (di-plō-bak'tē-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. diplōs, double, + NL. bacteria, pl. of bacterium, q. v.] Bacteria which consist of two cells or adhere in pairs.

These diplo-bacteria may assume a curved or annular shape.

Amer. Nat., XXII. 132.

diploblastic (di-plō-blas'tik), a. [Gr. diplōs, double, + blastos, germ, + -ic.] In biol., having two germinal layers, endoblastic and ectoblastic, or a two-layered blastoderm: correlated with monoblastic and triploblastic.

A third layer, the mesoblast or mesoderm, occurs; hence these are known as triploblastic animals, in contradistinction to those with only hypoblast and epiblast, which are called diploblastic.

Stand. Nat. Hist., I. xi.

diplocardiac (di-plō-kār'di-ak), a. [Gr. di-, two, + cardia = E. heart: see cardiac.] Having the heart double—that is, with completely separated right and left halves, and consequently distinct pulmonary and systemic circulation of the blood, as all birds and mammals. diplococcus (di-plō-kōk'us), n. [NL., Gr. diplōs, double, + coccus, a berry.] In bot., a coupled spherule; a cell or similar organism resulting from the process of conjugation of two or more cells.

Coupled spherules are called diplococci.

Stapel, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), I. 188.

Diploconites (di-plō-kōn'itēs), n. pl. [NL., Gr. Diploconus + -ites.] A family of acantharians with a shell having in the axis a pair of strong spicules running in opposite directions, and shaped like an hour-glass or a double cone.

Diplococcus (di-plō-kō'us), n. [NL., Gr. di-, two, + coccus, cone.] A genus of monocyttarian radiolarians, giving name to the family Diplococcidae. Haeckel, 1860.

diploidal (di-plō'idāl), a. [Gr. diplōs, double, + idēs, way, + -al.] In soöl., having both prosodal and apodal canals, or canals of entrance and exit, well developed, as a sponge. The genus Chondrosia is an example.

This, which from the marked presence of both prosodal and apodal canals may be termed the diploidal type of the Rhagon canal system, occurs but rarely.

W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 418.

Diplocodidae (di-plō-dōs'idēs), n. pl. [NL., Gr. Diplocodus + -idae.] A family of sauropod dinosaurs, formed for the reception of the genus Diplocodus.

Diplocodus (di-plōd'ō-kus), n. [NL., Gr. di-, two, + cōdax, a bearing-beam, main beam, any beam or bar.] A genus of sauropod dinosaurs, based on remains from the Upper Jurassic of Colorado. It is characterized by a weak dentition confined to the fore part of the jaws, and the ram of the ischia straight, not expanded distally, and meeting in the middle line. O. C. Marsh, 1871.

Diploodontia (di-plō-dōn'ōn'ti-ā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. diplōs, double, + odont (odont) = E. tooth.] In Blyth's edition of Cuvier, an order of placental Mammalia, consisting of the Pachydermata, herbivorous Cetacea, Edentata, and Mammalia of Cuvier; one of two orders constituting Blyth's phytophagous type of mammals. [Not in use.] diplos (di-plō's), n. [NL., Gr. diplōs, fem. of diplōs, contr. diplōs, twofold, double (= L. duplus, q. v.), ult. E. double, q. v.], Gr. di-, two, + plōs, akin to L. plus, more, and E. full.] 1. In anat., the light spongy substance or open cancellated or reticulated structure of bone be-between the hard dense inner and outer tables of the cranial bones.—2. In bot., the parenchyma of a leaf, lying between the two epidermal surfaces. Also called medullula. [Rare.]

Section through the Skull of a Cochlearia (Cochlearia geminata), showing the Diplos filling the space between the inner and outer walls of the cranium.

diploëtic (di-plō-ēt'ik), a. [Gr. diplōs + (improp.) -etic.] Same as diploic.

Diplogangliata (di-plō-gang-gli-ā'tā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. diplōs, double, + ganglion, ganglion, + -ata.] In Grant's classification, a division of animals, partially synonymous with the Arthropoda of Cuvier, or the modern Arthropoda. diplogangliate (di-plō-gang-gli-āt), a. Of or pertaining to the Diplogangliata.

diplogonensis (di-plō-jen'ē-sis), n. [NL., Gr. diplōs, double, + gonos, generation.] In teratol., the duplication of parts normally single, or the production of a double monster.

diplogenic (di-plō-jen'ik), a. [Gr. diplōs, double, + gonos, kind, + -ic.] Producing two substances; partaking of the nature of two bodies.

Diploglossata (di-plō-glo-sā'tā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. diplōs, double, + glossa, tongue, + -ata.] A group of saltatorial orthopterous insects, established for the reception of the genus Hemiteles. De Saussure.

diplograph (di-plō-grāf), n. [Gr. diplōs, double, + graphein, write.] A Swiss writing-apparatus for the use of the blind, consisting of lettered disks with mechanism to rotate them and to bring any letter desired in position to imprint it on a sheet of paper placed in the machine. It is practically a clumsy form of the type-writer. E. H. Knight.

Diplograpsus (di-plō-grap'sus), n. [NL., Gr. diplōs, double, + grapsus, standing for graptolite.] A genus of Paleozoic graptolites, of the family Graptolitiidae, having the cells arranged back to back on each side of the axis, like the vanes of a feather. They occur in the Cambrian and Silurian strata. Also Diplograpsus. M'Con, 1847.

diplois (di-plō'is), a. [Gr. diplōs + -is.] Of or pertaining to the diplos: as, diplois tissue; diplois structure. Also diploma.—Diploma veins, veins ramifying in the diploid. They are comparatively numerous and of large size, with extremely thin walls, adherent to the hard tissue, so that they do not collapse when cut or torn, but remain patent, giving rise to persistent hemorrhage.

diploid (dip'loid), n. [Gr. διπλός, double, + εἶδος, form.] In crystal, a solid belonging to the isometric system, with 24 trapezoidal planes. It is the parallel-hemihedral form of the hexoctahedron. Also called dyakis-dodecahedron.

Diploid.

diploidion (dip-lō'id-i-on), n.; pl. diploidia (-ia). [Gr. διπλοῖον, dim. of διπλός (diploid), a garment in two thicknesses or folds: see diplois.] In anc. Gr. costume: (a) A particular form of the female chiton or tunic, in which the garment is double from the shoulders to the waist, the outer fold hanging loose, like a sort of sleeveless mantle. (b) More rarely, a separate garment so disposed over the chiton as to give the whole arrangement the appearance of a single piece.

Diploidion.
From a metopa of the temple of Zeus at Olympia.

Her (Demeter's) chiton is of a thick material, forming deep folds, and having over her breast a diploidion, which throws out strong and simple masses.

A. S. Murray, Greek Sculpture, II. 82.

diplois (dip-lō'is), n. [Gr. διπλοῖς, a garment in two thicknesses or folds, < διπλός, double: see diplois.] In anc. Gr. costume, same as diploidion.

A woman clothed in a sleeveless talaric chiton with diplois.
B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 177.

Diploleparis (dip-lō-le-pā'ri-s), n. pl. [NL, irreg. < Diplolepis, < Gr. διπλός, double, + λέρις, a scale, rind, a genus of hymenopterous insects, + -aris.] In Latreille's system of classification, the same as Gallicola, or the gall-flies, of the modern family Cynipidae.

diploma (di-plō'mā), n. [= F. diplôme = Sp. Pg. It. diploma = D. diploma = G. Dan. Sw. diplom. < L. diploma, < Gr. διπλωμα(-r-), a paper folded double, a letter of recommendation or introduction, later a letter of license or privilege granted by a person in authority, < διπλός, double, < διπλός, double: see diplois.] 1. Originally, a letter or other composition written on paper or parchment and folded. Hence—2. Any letter, literary muniment, or public document. See diplomatics.—3. In modern use, a letter or writing, usually under seal and signed by competent authority, conferring some honor, privilege, or power, as that given by a college in evidence of a degree, or authorizing a physician to practise his profession, and the like.

The granting of diplomas by universities or other learned bodies proceeds on the supposition that the public require some assistance to their judgment in the choice of professional services, and that such an official scrutiny into the qualifications of practitioners is a useful security against the imposture or incompetency of mere pretenders to skill.
Sir C. C. Lewis, Authority in Matters of Opinion, ix. 17.

diploma (di-plō'mā), v. t. [< diploma, n.] To furnish with a diploma; certify by a diploma. [Rare.]

Doggeries never so diplomaed, be-puffed, gas-lighted, continue doggeries.
Carlyle.

diplomacy (di-plō'ma-si), n.; pl. diplomatics (-ics). [= *D. diplomatie = G. diplomatie = Dan. Sw. diplomati, < F. diplomatie (i pron. a) = Sp. Pg. diplomacia = It. diplomazia, < L. as if *diploma(-t), < diploma, < Gr. διπλωμα(-r-), a diploma: see diploma.*] 1. The science of the forms, ceremonies, and methods to be observed in conducting the actual intercourse of one state with another, through authorized agents, on the basis of international law; the art of conducting such intercourse, as in negotiating and drafting treaties, representing the interests of a state or its subjects at a foreign court, etc.

As diplomacy was in its beginnings, so it lasted for a long time; the ambassador was the man who was sent to lie abroad for the good of his country.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 235.

2. The act or practice of negotiation or official intercourse, as between independent powers; diplomatic procedure in general; the transaction of international business: as, the history of European diplomacy. [Rare in the plural.]

Richard [I.] by a piece of rough diplomacy, prevailed on Guy of Lusignan to surrender his claim to the shadowy crown of Jerusalem, and to accept the lordship of Cyprus instead.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 162.

A victory of the North over the South, and the extraordinary clemency and good sense with which that victory was used, had more to do with the concession of the franchise to householders in boroughs, than all the eloquence of Mr. Gladstone and all the diplomats of Mr. Disraeli.
Portingault Rev., N. S., XXXI. 161.

Hence—3. Dexterity or skill in managing negotiations of any kind; artful management with the view of securing advantages; diplomatic tact.—4. A diplomatic body; the whole body of ministers at a foreign court. [Rare.]

The foreign ministers were ordered to attend at this investiture of the directory; for so they call the managers of their burlesque government. The diplomats, who were a sort of envoys, were quite over-struck with the pride, pomp, and circumstance of this majestic senate!
Burke, A Regicide Peace, iv.

5. Same as diplomats. [Rare.]

These [forms of ancient Anglo-Saxon letters] would probably give ground for a near guess to one expert in Anglo-Saxon diplomacy.
J. Haddley, Essays, p. 120.

diplomat (dip-lō'mat), n. [Also written diplomate; = *D. diplomate = G. Dan. Sw. diplomat, < F. diplomate = Pg. diplomata, < NL. as if *diplomata, one provided with letters of authority, < L. diploma(-t), diploma: see diploma.*] One who is employed or skilled in diplomacy; a diplomatist.

Unless the diplomats of Europe are strangely misinformed, general political differences have not come, and are not likely to come, just at present under discussion.
Saturday Rev.

diplomate (dip-lō'māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. diplomated, pp. diplomating. [< diploma + -ate.] To invest with a title or privilege by a diploma; diploma. [Rare.]

He was diplomated doctor of divinity in 1660.
A. Wood, Athena Oxon.

diplomatic (dip-lō'mā'shial), a. [< diplomacy (F. diplomatie) + -al.] Same as diplomatic.
Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

diplomatic (dip-lō'mat'ik), a. and n. [= *F. diplomatique = Sp. diplomático = Pg. It. diplomatico (cf. D. G. diplomatisch = Dan. Sw. diplomatisk), < L. as if *diplomaticus, < diploma(-t), diploma: see diploma.*] I. a. 1. Pertaining to diplomas or diplomatics.

Diplomatic science, the knowledge of which will enable us to form a proper judgment of the age and authenticity of manuscripts, chords, records, and other monuments of antiquity.
Ade, Orig. and Prog. of Writing, Int.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of diplomacy; concerned with the management of international relations: as, a diplomatic agent.

The diplomatic activity of Henry II. throughout his reign was enormous; all nations of Europe came by envoys to his court, and his ministers . . . ran about from one end of Europe to another.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 127.

Several of our earlier and best Secretaries of State had had the benefit of personal experience in the diplomatic service abroad. E. Schuyler, American Diplomacy, p. 8.

3. Skilled in the art of diplomacy; artful in negotiation or intercourse of any kind; polite in conduct.—Diplomatic corps or body, the entire body of diplomatists accredited to and resident at a court or capital, including the ambassador, minister, or chargé d'affaires, the secretaries of legation, the military and naval attachés, etc.

II. n. A minister, an official agent, or an envoy to a foreign court; a diplomat.

diplomatical (dip-lō'mat'ikal), a. Same as diplomatic.

diplomatically (dip-lō'mat'ikal-i), adv. 1. According to the rules or art of diplomacy.

Write diplomatically; even in declaring war men are quite courteous.
Lowe, Bismarck, II. 568.

2. Artfully; with or by good management.—3. With reference to diplomatics; from the point of view of diplomatics.

The indication-number in 16 is diplomatically uncertain, and so of no independent value.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 192.

diplomatics (dip-lō'mat'iks), n. [Pl. of diplomatic; see -ics.] The science of diplomas, or of ancient writings, literary and public documents, letters, decrees, charters, codicils, etc., which has for its object to decipher such instruments, or to ascertain their authenticity, their date, signatures, etc.

diplomatic (di-plō'ma-tism), n. [< L. diploma(-t) + -ism.] Diplomatic action or practice; something characteristic of diplomacy. [Rare.]
diplomatic (di-plō'ma-tist), n. [< L. diploma(-t) + -ist; = F. diplomate.] A person officially employed in international intercourse, as an ambassador or a minister; in general, one versed in the art of diplomacy; a diplomat.

The talents and accomplishments of a diplomatist are widely different from those which qualify a politician to lead the House of Commons in agitated times.
Keatsley, Hist. Eng., II.

diplomatie (di-plō'ma-tis), v.; pret. and pp. diplomated, pp. diplomating. [< L. diploma(-t) + -ize.] I. trans. To practise diplomacy; use diplomatic art or skill.

Not being a scheming or a diplomating man himself, he did not look upon others as if they were always driving at something.
Max Müller, Biograph. Essays, p. 125.

II. trans. 1. To actuate or effect by diplomacy. [Rare.]

Louis Napoleon had not long been menaced out of Mexico, and diplomated out of Luxemburg, when, from his inveterate habit of putting his finger into every man's pie, he suddenly found himself in possession of Rome.
Lowe, Bismarck, I. 478.

2. To confer a diploma upon. Thackeray.

Also spelled diplomatis.

diplomatology (di-plō'ma-tol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. διπλωμα(-r-) (see diploma) + -λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] The study or science of diplomatics. [Rare.]

Certain it is that many of the young doctors whose specialty is Semitic philology, or Hebrew archaeology, or Church history, or diplomatology, have no deep interest in or little knowledge of the distinctively Christian doctrines.
G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 14.

Diplomorpha (dip-lō-mō'fā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + μορφή, form.] A group of hydroids; a synonym of Calyptoblastea.

Diplomura (dip-lō-mū'rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + νευρῶν, nerve, sinew.] In Grant's system of classification, a group of annelids or worms.

Diplophysa (dip-lō-fī'sā), n. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + φυσάω, a bellows.] 1. A supposed genus of oceanic hydroids, of the order Calyptoblastea, being detached diphyroids of Sphaerocystes, as D. tuermsi from Sphaerocystes gracilis. Gogenbaur, 1853. [Not in use.]—2. A genus of fishes.

diplopia (di-plō'pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + ὄψις (-ōs), eye.] In pathol., the morbid condition of vision in which a single object appears double. Also diplopia.

diplopie (di-plop'ik), a. [< diplopia + -ie.] Seeing double; affected with diplopia; caused by diplopia, as a double visual image.

diploplacula (dip-lō-plak'ŭ-lā), n. pl. [< Gr. διπλός, double, + -πλάκη, < πλάω, blow, breathe.] Same as Dipnoi.

diploped (dip-lō-pod), a. and n. I. a. Double-footed: an epithet applied to the chilognathous Myriapoda or Diplopoda, which have two pairs of limbs on each segment of the body.

It is a new form of Gregarinidae was found in the digestive tube of Glossaria, one of the diploped myriapods, and has been named Cnemidopora lutea.
Smithsonian Report, 1882, Zoology.

II. a. One of the Diplopoda or Chilognathia.

Diplopoda (di-plop'ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + ποδ-, < πούς, foot.] The millepeds as an order of myriapods; the Chilognathia (which see); so called from the doubling in number of the legs, most of the segments of the body having two pairs: contrasted with Chilopoda.

diplopedous (di-plop'ō-dus), a. [As diploped + -ous.] Diploped; chilognathous.

Diploprion (di-plop'ri-on), n. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + πρίων, a saw.] A genus of serranoid fishes with serrature to the preoperculum as well as to the suboperculum, typical of the subfamily Diploprioninae.

Diploprioninae (di-plop'ri-on-i-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Diploprion(-t) + -inae.] A subfamily of Serranidae, represented by the genus Diploprion, with distinct spinous and soft dorsals and two anal spines. The only known species, Diploprion kassidensis, ranges from the Japanese to the Indian archipelago.

II. a. One of the Diplopoda or Chilognathia.

Diploprion (di-plop'ri-on), n. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + πρίων, a saw.] A genus of serranoid fishes with serrature to the preoperculum as well as to the suboperculum, typical of the subfamily Diploprioninae.

Diploprioninae (di-plop'ri-on-i-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Diploprion(-t) + -inae.] A subfamily of Serranidae, represented by the genus Diploprion, with distinct spinous and soft dorsals and two anal spines. The only known species, Diploprion kassidensis, ranges from the Japanese to the Indian archipelago.

Diploprion (di-plop'ri-on), n. [NL., < Gr. διπλός, double, + πρίων, a saw.] A genus of serranoid fishes with serrature to the preoperculum as well as to the suboperculum, typical of the subfamily Diploprioninae.

Diploptera (di-plop'te-ri), a. pl. [NL., pl. of Diplopterus, q. v.] In Blaschke's ichthyological system (1899), an order of fishes restricted to the family Diplopteridae.

Diplopteridae (di-plop'te-ri-dæ), a. pl. [NL., < Diplopterus + -idæ.] A family of fossil cross-pterygian fishes, typified by the genus Diplopterus.

Diplopteroid (di-plop'te-ri-oid), a. pl. [NL., < Diplopterus + -oides.] An extinct family of fishes, typified by the genus Diplopterus, and including also Dipterus, Osteolepis, Tripterus, Glyptoporus, and Stegonolepis. Also called Diplopteroid.

diplopterus (di-plop'te-rus), a. [NL. < Gr. diplo-, double, + pteron, a wing, a fin.] In entom., having the two wings folded, as a wasp; specifically, of or pertaining to the Diploptera.

Diplopterus (di-plop'te-rus), a. [NL. < Gr. diplo-, double, + pteron, a wing, a fin.] 1. In zool., a genus of fossil fishes of the Old Red Sandstone, typical of the family Diplopteridae; so called from the two dorsal fins. Agassiz, 1855. — 2. In ornith., a genus of American ground-cuckoos, of the subfamily Saurorhina, sometimes giving name to a subfamily Diploptina. D. novus is an example. D. phaeolatus represents a different section of the same genus. Baird, 1855.

Diplopterygia (di-plop'te-ri-gi-a), a. pl. [NL., < Gr. diplo-, double, + pteron, a wing, a fin.] Same as Diploptera.

Which Kirby, because the term pteron denotes the names of orders of insects, changed into Diplopterygia. E. P. Wright, Animal Life, p. 165.

diplopy (di-plop'i), a. Same as diplopia.

Diplosoma (di-plop'so-ma), a. [NL., < Gr. diplo-, double, + soma, body.] A genus of tunicates, typical of the family Diplosomidae.

Diplosomidae (di-plop'so-mi-dæ), a. pl. [NL., < Diplosoma + -idæ.] A family of composite tunicates, typified by the genus Diplosoma. The colony forms a thin investing layer; the zooids have two distinct regions (thorax and abdomen); and the branchial sac is large and has four rows of stigmata. A few small shallow-water species are known.

diplocephal (di-plop'se-fal), a. [[diplocephalus + -al.] Same as hypophyseal. [Rare.]

diplophane (di-plop'fæn), a. [Gr. diplo-, double, + phos, a wedge.] Same as hypophyseal. [Rare.]

diplopondyl (di-plop-on-dil'ik), a. [Gr. diplo-, double, + pondylus, vertebra, a vertebra (here in sense of 'centrum' or 'body of a vertebra'), + -ia.] In zool., having two centra, as a vertebral segment; having twice as many centra as arches, as a vertebral column, in consequence of the presence of an intercentrum between any two consecutive centra; embolomerous: applied to the vertebrae of fishes and batrachians, when only every alternate centrum bears a neural or a hemal arch.

diplopondylium (di-plop-on-dil'izm), a. [[diplopondylus + -ium.] In zool., the state or quality of being diplopondylic; that formation of a vertebral column in which, in consequence of the development of intercentra between centra proper, there appear to be twice as many bodies as arches of vertebrae, or in which every alternate vertebral body supports an arch; embolomerism.

diplopondylic (di-plop-on-dil'ik), a. [Gr. diplo-, double, + pondylus, the vertebra, a thread (mod. a centrum), + -ic.] In zool., having twice as many stamens as petals.

We say (the fewer is diplopondylic if the stamens are double the number of the petals and petals are in whorls. Z. Kew, Botany, p. 165.

diplopondylic (di-plop-on-dil'ik), a. [As diplopondylium + -ic.] In bot., the condition of a flower in which there are twice as many stamens as petals of sepals. Of the two whorls of stamens, the inner may be diplopondylic and the outer whorl not, or the reverse. The first case is normal or direct diplopondylic; the latter is called indirect.

Diplopterus (di-plop'te-ri), a. pl. [NL., pl. of Diplopterus, q. v.] In Blaschke's ichthyological system (1899), an order of fishes restricted to the family Diplopteridae.

Diplopteridae (di-plop'te-ri-dæ), a. pl. [NL., < Diplopterus + -idæ.] A family of fossil cross-pterygian fishes, typified by the genus Diplopterus.

Diploptera (di-plop'te-ri), a. pl. [NL., pl. of Diplopterus, q. v.] In Blaschke's ichthyological system (1899), an order of fishes restricted to the family Diplopteridae.

Diplopteridae (di-plop'te-ri-dæ), a. pl. [NL., < Diplopterus + -idæ.] A family of fossil cross-pterygian fishes, typified by the genus Diplopterus.

Diplopteroid (di-plop'te-ri-oid), a. pl. [NL., < Diplopterus + -oides.] An extinct family of fishes, typified by the genus Diplopterus, and including also Dipterus, Osteolepis, Tripterus, Glyptoporus, and Stegonolepis. Also called Diplopteroid.

diplopterus (di-plop'te-rus), a. [NL. < Gr. diplo-, double, + pteron, a wing, a fin.] In entom., having the two wings folded, as a wasp; specifically, of or pertaining to the Diploptera.

Diplopterus (di-plop'te-rus), a. [NL. < Gr. diplo-, double, + pteron, a wing, a fin.] 1. In zool., a genus of fossil fishes of the Old Red Sandstone, typical of the family Diplopteridae; so called from the two dorsal fins. Agassiz, 1855. — 2. Diplopterygia (di-plop'te-ri-gi-a), a. pl. [NL., < Gr. diplo-, double, + pteron, a wing, a fin.] Same as Diploptera.

Which Kirby, because the term pteron denotes the names of orders of insects, changed into Diplopterygia. E. P. Wright, Animal Life, p. 165.

E. mouse.] The typical and only genus of the subfamily Dipodomys. D. pallipes inhabits the Pacific coast region of the United States and Mexico. It is about four inches long, with the tail half as long again; it has brown or gray upper parts and snowy under parts, Kangaroo-rat (Dipodomys phillipsi).

a white stripe along each side of the tail, and another over the hips. A closely related species or variety, D. ordi, inhabits the interior Rocky Mountain region. They are known as kangaroo-rats, from the shape of the body and limbs and their great power of leaping.

dipody (dip'ō-di), n.; pl. dipodies (-dis). [L.L. dipodia (Atilius Fortunatianus, Marianus Victorinus, etc.), < Gr. di-, two-, + pod-, + rod- (rod-) = E. foot.] In pros., a group of two like feet; a double foot; especially, a pair of feet constituting a single measure. A dipody is marked as a unit by making the letus of one of the two feet stronger than that of the other. In ancient prosody iambi and trochees are regularly, and anapaests usually, measured by dipodies. Sometimes the word syzygy is used as equivalent to dipody.

One trochee or iambic dipody for thesis, and one for arsis. J. Hadley, Essays, p. 101.

dipolar (di-pō'lār), a. [< di- + polar.] 1. Having two poles; differentiated in respect to a pair of opposite directions, but not with respect to the difference between these directions: as, polarized light is dipolar.

When a dipolar quantity is turned end for end it remains the same as before. Tensions and pressures in solid bodies, extensions, compressions and distortions, and most of the optical, electrical, and magnetic properties of crystallized bodies are dipolar quantities.

Clark Maxwell, Elect. and Mag., § 381.

Along the axis of a crystal of quartz there is dipolar symmetry; along the lines of force in a transparent diamagnetic there is dipolar asymmetry. Tell, Light, § 238.

2. Pertaining to two poles.

Dipolia, n. pl. See Dipolia.

diporpa (di-pōr-pā), n.; pl. diporpes (-pē). [N.L., < Gr. di-, two-, + porpē, a buckle, clasp.] A supposed genus of trematode worms, being a stage in the development of members of the genus Diplosoma (which see), before two individuals are united by a kind of conjugation to form the double animal.

The Diporpa, when they leave the egg, are ciliated and provided with two eye-spots, with a small ventral sucker and a dorsal papilla. After a time the Diporpa approach, each applies its ventral sucker to the dorsal papilla of the other, and the coadapted parts of their bodies coalesce. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 132.

Bippel's oil. See oil.
dipper (dip'ər), n. [ME. dipper (only as the name for a water-bird: see defs. 5 and 6, and of didapper); < dip + -er.] 1. One who or that which dips. Specifically—2. [cap.] [Cl. dipper.] Same as Dunker.—3. In paper-manuf., the workman who mixes the pulp and puts it upon the mold.—4. One who dips snuff. See to dip snuff, under dip, v. t. [Southern U. S.]

The fair dipper holds in her lap a bottle containing the most pungent Scotch snuff, and in her mouth a short stick of soft wood, the end of which is chewed into a sort of brush. This is ever and anon taken out, thrust into the bottle, and returned to the mouth loaded, as a bee's leg is with pollen, with the yellow powder.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 75.

5. A bird of the genus Cinclus or family Cinclidæ: so called because it dips, ducks, or dives under water. The common European dipper, also called water-ousel and by many other names, is C. aquaticus, a small dark-colored bird with a white breast, of aquatic habits, inhabiting streams, and walking or flying under water with ease. The American dipper is a similar but distinct species, C. mexicanus, entirely dark-colored when adult. There are in all about 12 species of dipper, mostly inhabiting clear mountain-streams of various parts of the world. They belong to the turdiform group of ocine Passeres, in the vicinity of the thrushes, and are notable as the only thoroughly aquatic passerine birds. See out in next column, and also out under Cinclidæ.

Hence—6. Any swimming bird which dives with great ease and rapidly, as a grebe, dabchick, or didapper; especially, in the United European Dipper (Cinclus aquaticus).

States, the buffle, Bucephala albeola, which is also called spirit-duck for the same reason. See out under buffle.—7. A vessel of wood, iron, or tin, with a handle usually long and straight, used to dip water or other liquid.—8. [cap.] The popular name in the United States of the seven principal stars in Ursa Major, or the Great Bear: so called from their being arranged in the form of the vessel called a dipper. The corresponding stars in Ursa Minor are called the Little Dipper. See out under Ursa.—9. In photog., a holder or lifter for plunging plates into a sensitizing or fixing bath; especially, such a holder used in the wet-plate process for plunging the collodionized plate into the sensitizing bath of nitrate of silver.—10. A simple form of scoop-dredge. See dredging-machine.

dipper-clam (dip'ər-klam), n. A bivalve of the family Macridæ, Macra solidissima, inhabiting the eastern coast of the United States. It attains a large size, is of a subtriangular form, and its valves are sometimes used as dippers or suggest such use, whence the name.

dipperful (dip'ər-fəl), n. [< dipper + -ful, 2.] As much as a dipper will contain.

All hands continually dip up at random gauze dipperfuls of water. The Century, XXVI, 732.

dipping (dip'ing), n. [Verbal n. of dip, v.] 1. The act of plunging or immersing.

That which is dyed with many dippings is in grain, and can very hardly be washed out. Jer. Taylor, Repentance, v. § 4.

Specifically—2. Baptism by immersion.—3. The process of brightening ornamental brass-work, usually by first "pickling" it in dilute nitric acid, next scouring it with sand and water, and afterward plunging it for an instant only in a bath consisting of pure nitric acid.—4. A composition of boiled oil and grease, used in Scotland by curriers for softening leather and making it more fit for resisting dampness: in England called dubbing.—5. The washing of sheep to cleanse the fleece before shearing.—6. In ceram., the process of coating a coarse clay body with enamel or slip of a fine quality by plunging the vessel into the liquid material for the coating, or of covering stoneware with a glaze. Each piece is generally dipped by hand, and a skilful workman is able to give a uniform coating of the covering material to the whole piece at a single plunge. As soon as dipped, the piece is taken to the drying-house or hothouse.

7. A mode of taking snuff by rubbing it on the teeth and gums. See to dip snuff, under dip, v. t. [Southern U. S.]

dipping-compass (dip'ing-kum'pas), n. An instrument consisting essentially of a dipping-needle (which see), a vertical graduated circle whose center coincides with the axis of the needle, and a graduated horizontal circle, the whole being supported upon a tripod stand; an inclinometer. It is used to measure the angle of dip or inclination of the magnetic needle.

dipping-frame (dip'ing-frām), n. 1. A frame which holds the wicks to be dipped in the hot tallow-bath for making candles.—2.

Dipping-compass.

A frame on which a fabric is stretched while being dipped in a dye-bath.

dipping-house (dip'ing-hous), n. In ceram., the building in which the biscuit is dipped into the glaze or enamel. See dipping, 6.

dipping-liquor (dip'ing-lik'ər), n. Dilute sulphuric or nitric acid, used by founders and others to clean the surface of metal. See pickle.

dipping-needle (dip'ing-nē'dl), n. An instrument for showing the direction of the earth's magnetism. Its axis is at right angles to its length, and passes as exactly as possible through the center of gravity, about which it moves in a vertical plane. When a needle thus mounted is placed anywhere not in the magnetic equator, it dips or points downward; and if the vertical plane in which it moves coincides with the magnetic meridian, the position which it assumes shows at once the direction of the magnetic force. See out under dipping-compass.

dipping-pan (dip'ing-pan), n. A cast-iron tray or flask in which stereo-casts are made.

dipping-tube (dip'ing-tāb), n. Same as ashing-tube.

dipping-vat (dip'ing-vat), n. The tank containing the slip or glazing-film in which pottery is dipped to give it a fine surface.

dipping-wheel (dip'ing-hwēl), n. A contrivance for catching fish, consisting of a wheel placed in a narrow race or fishway in a stream, and acting as a current-wheel. The blades of the wheel are formed of nets, in which fish ascending the stream are caught, and from which they are thrown out upon the bank by the revolution of the wheel.

dip-pipe (dip'pīp), n. A valve in a gas-main arranged so as to dip into water or tar, and thus form a seal; a seal-pipe.

dip-regulator (dip'reg'ū-lā-tor), n. In gas-works, a device for regulating the seal of the dip-pipes in the hydraulic main, and for drawing off the heavy tar from the bottom of the main without disturbing the seal. E. H. Knight.

diprionidian (di-pri'ō-nid'i-an), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + prion, a saw (also a sawyer, prop. pr. of πριον, saw), + -id-ian.] An epithet applied to certain fossil hydrozoans the polypary of which has a row of cellules on each side: opposed to monoprionidian. Such hydrozoans are chiefly confined to the Lower Silurian and Cambrian formations.

diprismatic (di-pris-mat'ik), a. [< di- + prismatic.] 1. Doubly prismatic.—2. In crystal, having cleavages parallel to the sides of a four-sided vertical prism, and at the same time to a horizontal prism.

dip-rod (dip'rod), n. A rod on which candle-wicks are hung to be dipped into melted tallow.

dip-roller (dip'rō'ler), n. In a printing-press, a roller which dips ink out of the fountain.

diprosopus (di-pro-sō'pus), n. [N.L., < Gr. διπρόσωπος, two-faced, < di-, two-, + πρόσωπον, face.] In teratol., duplication of the face, in any of its grades, from simple duplication of the mouth-cavity to complete development of two entirely separate faces.

Diprotodon (di-prō'tō-don), n. [N.L., < Gr. di-, two-, + πρότος, first, + δόν, Ionic form of δοειν (doein-) = E. tooth.] 1. A genus of extinct marsupial quadrupeds, surpassing the rhinoceros in size. They had 3 incisors on each side of the upper and 1 on each side of the lower jaw; no canines; 1 premolar and 4 molars on each side of each jaw; the median upper incisors large and scaliform; the molars transversely ridged, as in the kangaroo, but without the longitudinal connecting ridge; and the hind limbs less disproportionately enlarged. The dentition of this genus gives name to the diprotodont pattern of primitive herbivorous marsupials. D. australis is a species found in the Tertiary of Australia.

2. [i. e.] An animal of this genus.

Diprotodon, an animal holding the same place amongst the Australian mammals that the pachyderms do amongst the fauna of other continents. Science, VI, 81.

diprotodont (di-prō'tō-dont), a. and n. [< Diprotodon (t-).] 1. a. Having two lower front teeth; noting the herbivorous type of dentition in marsupial mammals, in which the median incisors are prominent, and the lateral incisors and canines small or wanting; specifically, having the characters of the genus Diprotodon: opposed to polyprotodont.

II. n. An animal of the genus Diprotodon; a marsupial with diprotodont dentition.

Diprotodontia (di-prō'tō-don'thi-ā), n. pl. [N.L., < Diprotodon (t-) + -ia.] A group of marsupials characterized by the diprotodont dentition.

Dipsacaceæ (dip-sā-kā-sē-s), n. pl. [N.L., sometimes impropr. Dipsacæ, < Dipsacus + -aceæ.] A natural order of gamopetalous dicotyledonous plants, with opposite leaves and the small flow-

Dipterygi (di-p'te-rij'i), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + pteron, a fin, a little wing, dim. of pteron, a wing.] In Bloch and Schneider's classification, an artificial group or class of fishes, distinguished simply by having two fins, or supposed to be so distinguished. It was based on error of observation, and included a tetraodontid (Oreus) and the genera Petromyzon and Leptocephalus. [Never used except by Bloch and Schneider.]

Dipteryx (di-p'te-riks), n. [NL., also improp. Dipterix, lit. two-winged? (in allusion to its two enlarged calyx-lobes). < Gr. di-, two-, + pteron, a wing, < pteron, a wing.] A genus of Leguminosae, found in the forests of Brazil, Guiana, etc., including 8 species. The fruit is of a character unusual in the order, being a one-seeded drupe. D. odorata of Cayenne furnishes the Tonquin or Tonka or Angustura bean, used for scenting snuff, for sachets, etc. The wood is very hard, strong, and durable, and is sometimes known as camara-wood. D. Eboensis, the eboe-tree of the Mosquito coast, Nicaragua, is a large tree, of which the wood is excessively heavy, and the inodorous fruit yields a large amount of oil.

diptote (di-p'tot), n. [LL. diptota, pl., < Gr. diptotos, with a double case-ending, < di-, two-, + ptote, falling (πτωσις, case), < πτω, fall.] In gram., a noun which has only two cases, as the Latin suppetia, suppetias, assistance.

diptych (di-p'tik), n. [LL. diptycha, pl., < Gr. diptuxa, pl., a pair of writing-tablets (earlier diptuxa, diptuxa, lit. a double-folded tablet), neut. of diptuxos, double-folded, < di-, two-, + ptuxh, fold, < πτύσσω, fold. The second element exists also in polyptych, q. v.] 1. A hinged two-leaved tablet of wood, ivory, or metal, with waxed inner surfaces, used by the Greeks and Romans for writing with the style. In Rome, during the empire, consuls and other officials were in the habit of sending as presents to their friends artistic diptychs inscribed with their names, date of entering upon office, etc.

2. In the early church: (a) The tablets on which were written the names of those who were to be especially commemorated at the celebration of the eucharist. (b) The list of names so recorded. (c) The intercessions in the course of which these names were introduced. The recitation of the name of any prelate or civil ruler in the diptychs was a recognition of his orthodoxy; its omission, the reverse. The mention of a person after death recognized him as having died in the communion of the church, and the introduction of his name into the list of saints or martyrs constituted canonization. In liturgies the diptychs are distinguished as the diptychs of the living and the diptychs of the dead, the latter including also the commemoration of the saints. In most liturgies the diptychs are included in the great intercession (see intercession). In the Western Church the use of the diptychs died out between the ninth and the twelfth century; in the Eastern Church it still continues. [In the ecclesiastical sense it is always plural with the definite article — the diptychs.]

What used anciently to be called the diptychs, but in later times the head-roll. Reed, Church of our fathers, II. 366.

3. In art, a pair of pictures or carvings on two panels hinged together. They are common in Byzantine and medieval art, and in the later examples are generally of a religious character. See triptych. [In this sense usually singular.]

Little worm-eaten diptychs, showing angular saints on gilded panels. H. James, Jr., Fans, Pilgrims, p. 266.

Dipus (di-p'us), n. [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + pus (πῦς) = E. foot.] The typical genus of jerboas of the family Dipodidae and subfamily Dipodinae: so called from the mode of progression, which is by means of great leaps with the hind legs, aided by the long tail, as in the kangaroo. Dipus sagitta is an example. See Dipodidae, jerboa.

diptygus (di-pi-g'us), n.; pl. diptygi (-ji). [NL., < Gr. di-, two-, + ptug, rump, buttocks.] In teratology, a monster in which the pelvis and the lumbar portion of the spinal column are duplicated.

diptylon (di-pi-lon), n.; pl. diptyla (-la). [L., < Gr. di-, two-, + ptylon, gate.] In anc. Gr. fort., a gate consisting of two separate gates placed side by side. It is to be distinguished from the form of double gate, composed of an outer and an inner gate with a walled court between them — a usual disposition of Greek fortress gates. The most conspicuous example of the diptylon is the Sacred Gate of Athens (called the Diptylon by way of eminence), on the northwest of the city, which afforded access to the outer Ceramicus and to the Academy, and through which passed the Sacred Way to Eleusis and the main road to the Piræus.

diptyre (di-pir'), n. [LL. diptyros, < Gr. di-, two-, + ptir, twice put in the fire, < di-, twice, + ptir = E. fire.] A mineral occurring in square prisms, either single or adhering to one another in fascicular groups. Before the blowpipe it melts with ebullition or intumescence, and its powder on hot coals phosphoresces with a feeble light. Its name indicates the double effect of fire upon it in producing first phosphorescence and then fusion. It consists chiefly of silicate of alumina, with small proportions of the silicates of soda and lime, and belongs to the scapolite family.

diptyrenous (di-pi-r'e-nus), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + pyren, the stone of a stone-fruit (see pyrene), + -ous.] In bot., containing two stones or pyrenes.

diradiation (di-ra-di-é-shon), n. [< L. di- for dis, asunder, + radiatio (-n), radiation.] The emission and diffusion of rays of light or heat from a luminous body; radiation.

Dirca (dér'kə), n. [NL.; cf. L. Dirca, Gr. Dirca, a fountain near Thebes in Boeotia.] A genus of apetalous shrubs, of the natural order Thymelacaceae, and the sole representative of the order in North America. There are two species, D. palustris of the Atlantic States and D. occidentalis of California. They are known as leatherwood, from the very tough inner bark. The flowers precede the leaves, and are followed by a small reddish drupaceous fruit. All parts of the plant are acrid. The bark of D. palustris produces violent vomiting when taken into the stomach, and erythema and ultimate vesication when applied to the skin.

Dircaea (dér-es'é), n. [NL., < L. Dircaea, fem. of Dircaeus, pertaining to Dirca; see Dirca.] A genus of beetles, of the family Meloidryidae. The species inhabit northern Europe and North America. Seven have been described, five of which are American. D. concolor occurs in the middle States. The genus was founded by Fabricius in 1798.

Dircaea (dér-es'é-i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Dircaea + -idae.] A family of Coleoptera, named from the genus Dircaea. Kirby, 1837. [Not in use.]

diridium (dir'dum), n. [Sc., also diridam, diridum; cf. Gael. diridan, anger, surliness, snarling.] 1. Tumult; uproar.

There is such a diridium forthwith for the loss of your gear and means. W. Guthrie, Sermons, p. 17.

2. A blow; hence, a stroke of misfortune; an ill turn.—3. A scolding; a scolding.

My word! but she's no blate to show her nose here. I gied her such a diridum the last time I got her sitting in our laundry as might hae served her for a twelvemonth. Petticoat Tale, I. 230.

dire (dir), a. [< L. dirus, fearful, awful, dreadful, akin to Gr. deinós, fearful, terrible, deinós, fearful, frightened, deidō, fear, v., deōs, fear.] Causing or attended by great fear or terrible suffering; dreadful; awful: as, dire disaster; the dire results of intemperance.

Medusa was so dire a monster as to turn into stone all those who but looked upon her. Bacon, Fable of Perseus.

Dire was the noise Of conflict. Milton, P. L., v. 211.

What dire distress
Could make me cast all hope of life aside?
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 168.

—Syn. Fearful, woeful, disastrous, calamitous, destructive, terrific, awful, portentous.

direct (di-rekt'), a. [ME. directe = F. Pr. direct = Sp. Pg. directo, Pg. also directo = It. diretto = D. G. direct = Dan. direkte = Sw. direkt, < L. directus, straight, level, upright, steep, pp. of dirigere (also dirigere, with prefix de-), set in a straight line, straighten, direct, guide, steer, arrange, < di- for dis, apart (or de-, down), + regere, keep straight, direct, rule; see regent, right. From L. directus come also ult. dress, address, droit, adroit, maladroit.] 1. Straight; undeviating; not oblique, crooked, circuitous, refracted, or collateral: as, to pass in a direct line from one body or place to another; a direct course or aim; a direct ray of light; direct descent (that is, descent in an unbroken line through male ancestors).

It was no time by direct means to seek her. Sir P. Sidney.

There were six Dukes of Normandy in France, in a direct line succeeding from Father to Son. Baker, Chronicles, p. 20.

2. In astron., appearing to move forward in the zodiac according to the natural order and succession of the signs, or from west to east: opposed to retrograde: as, the motion of a planet is direct.—3. Having a character, relation, or action analogous to that of straightness of direction or motion: as, a direct interest (that is, part ownership) in a property or business.

It is scarcely too much to say that Lord Byron never wrote without some reference, direct or indirect, to himself. Manselley, Moore's Byron.

In a great modern state it is comparatively few who have any direct personal knowledge of foreign affairs or any direct personal interest in them. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 245.

Differences on subjects of the first importance are always painful, but the direct shock of contrary enthusiasms has something appalling about it. J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 2.

4. In the natural, unreflecting way; proceeding by a simple method to attain an object; without modifying one's procedure owing to reconsiderations; explicit; free from the influence of extraneous circumstances. Thus, a direct accusation is one made with the avowed intent of bringing the alleged offender to justice; opposed to a speech or writing which has the same effect without the avowal of the purpose, or perhaps not even of the meaning. 5. Plain; express; not ambiguous; straightforward; positive: as, he made a direct acknowledgment.

Add not a doubtful comment to a text
That in itself is direct and easy.
Bacon, and Pl., Thierry and Theodore, III. 1.

Being busy above, a great cry I hear, and go down; and what should it be but Jane in a fit of direct raving, which lasted half an hour. Peage, Diary, Aug. 13, 1668.

6. Straightforward; characterized by the absence of equivocation or ambiguity; open; ingenuous; sincere.

There be that are in nature faithful and sincere, and plain and direct; not crafty and involved. Bacon.

I want a simple answer, and direct.
But you evade; yes! 'tis as I suspect.
Crabbe, The Borough.

7. In logic, proceeding from antecedent to consequent, from cause to effect, etc.—Direct action, see action, and direct action, a.—Direct battery, congruity, contempt, conversion, demonstration, dial evidence, examination, fire, etc. See the nouns.—Direct illumination, rays, etc., illumination, rays, etc., without reflection or refraction.—Direct induced current. See induction.—Direct interval. See interval.—Direct motion, in music, the motion of two voices in the same direction, up or down. It is also called similar motion, and includes parallel motion. See motion.—Direct operation, in math., an operation performed by the direct application of a rule, and not by trial or approximation: opposed to inverse operation.—Direct predication, in logic, one the subject of which denotes an object while the predicate signifies a character: opposed to indirect predication, in which the subject conveys the quality while the predicate indicates the object.—Direct product, the scalar quantity obtained by multiplying the magnitudes of two vectors together with the cosine of the angular difference of their directions.—Direct proof, proof which proceeds from a rule and the statement of a case as coming under that rule to the application of the rule to that case: as, few men wounded in the liver recover; this man is wounded in the liver; this man will probably not recover.—Direct ratio, or direct proportion. See ratio.—Direct rhythm. See rhythm.—Direct sphere, a sphere whose pole coincides with the zenith or lies on the horizon.—Direct tax. See tax.—Direct turn, in music, a melodic embellishment. See turn.—Direct vision, vision by unreflected and unreflected rays.—Direct-vision spectroscope. See spectroscopy.—Direct way around an inclosure or a circuit, in math., that way around in which the inside of the inclosure is kept at the left-hand side.

direct (di-rekt'), v. [ME. directen, < L. directus, pp. of dirigere (> It. dirigere = Sp. Pg. dirigir = F. diriger = D. dirigere = G. dirigere = Dan. dirigere = Sw. dirigera), straighten, direct; see direct, a., and cf. dress, v. Cf. also dirge, dirigible.] I. trans. 1. To point or aim in a straight line toward a place or an object; cause to move, act, or work toward a certain object or end; determine in respect to direction: as, to direct an arrow or a piece of ordnance; to direct the eye; to direct a course or flight.

The master of the ship is judged by the directing his course aright. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 126.

But though the rank which you hold in the royal family might direct the eyes of a poet to you, yet your beauty and goodness detain and fix them.

Dryden, Deed of Indian Emperor.

I have sometimes reflected for what reason the Turks should appoint such Marks to direct their faces toward in Prayer. Manselley, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 14.

2. To point out or make known a course to; impart information or advice to for guidance: as, to direct a person to his destination; he directed his friend's attention to an improved method.

Direct me, if it be your will,
Where great Audius lies. Shak., Cor., IV. 4.

3. To control the course of; regulate; guide or lead; govern; cause to proceed in a particular manner: as, to direct the steps of a child, or the affairs of a nation.

Let discretion
Direct your anger. Fletcher, Double Marriage, v. 2.

They taught how to direct the voice unto harmony. Sandys, Travels, p. 175.

And, pleased the Almighty's orders to perform,
Rides in the whirlwind, and directs the storm.
Addison, The Campaign, I. 292.

4. To order; instruct; point out to, as a course of proceeding, with authority; prescribe to.

I'll first direct my men what they shall do.
Shak., M. W., IV. 2.

The Prophet directed his followers to order their children to say their prayers when seven years of age. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 7.

5. In music, to conduct; lead (a company of vocal or instrumental performers) as conductor or director.—6. To superscribe; write the name and address of the recipient on; address: as, to direct a letter or a package.

Str. Pymant. Carry it to my Lady. . .

Boy. 'Tis directed to your Worship.

Comptrol. Double-Dealer, III. 7.

7. To aim or point at, as discourse; address.

Words sweetly plac'd, and modestly directed.

Shak. I Hen. VI., v. 3.

O moral Gower, this book I direct

To thee.

Chaucer. Troilus, I.

8. In astral., to calculate the arc of the equator between the significator and the promotor.

—Directed right line, a line which is regarded as distinguished in respect to the distinction between the two directions in which it might be passed over by a moving point.—Syn. 3. Guide, Sweep (see guide); Conduct, etc. (see manage and govern); to dispose, rule, command (see enjoin), control.

II. intrans. 1. To act as a guide; point out a course; exercise power or authority in guiding.

Wisdom is profitable to direct.

Ecc. x. 10.

He controls and directs absolutely.

N. A. Rev. CXLII. 502.

2. In music, to act as director or conductor. direct (di-rekt'), n. [< direct, v.] In musical notation, the sign  $\bowtie$  placed at the end of a staff or of a page to indicate to the performer the position of the first note of the next staff or page.

direct (di-rekt'), adv. [< ME. directe; < direct, a.] In a direct manner; directly; straight: as, he went direct to the point.

And faire Venus, the beauty of the night,

Upraise, and set unto the west full right

Her golden face in opposition

Of God Phebus directly descending down.

Henryson. Testament of Cressida, I. 14.

direct-action (di-rekt'-ak'-shn), n. In mech., characterized by direct action: a term applied to engines which have the piston-rod or cross-head connected directly to, or by a connecting-rod with, the crank, dispensing with working-beams and side levers: as, a direct-action steam-engine.

A rectilinear motion of the piston is insured by a cross-head at the end of the piston-rod, which slides in parallel guides, or, in the case of the oscillating engine, the cylinder vibrates in accordance with the movement of the crank. Special types of direct-action engines are the annular double-cylinder, double-piston, inclined-cylinder, inverted-cylinder, oscillating, sliding-crank, steerable, and trunk-engines. Also applied to steam-pumps which have the steam-piston connected by the piston-rod directly to the pump-piston or plunger, and which have valve-gear that prevents stopping on what is called the dead-center. Such pumps work without cranks or fly-wheels.

direct-draft (di-rekt'-draft'), a. Having a single direct flue: applied to steam-boilers.

director (di-rekt'), n. See director.

directing (di-rekt'-ing), p. a. [Pr. of direct, v.] Giving or affording direction; guiding.—Directing circle. See gonion.

—Directing plane, in perspective, a plane passing through the point of sight parallel to the plane of the picture.—Directing point. In perspective, the point where any original line meets the directing plane.

direction (di-rekt'-shn), n. [= F. direction = Sp. direccion = Pg. direccao = It. direzione = D. directie = G. direction = Dan. Sw. direction, < L. directio(-n-), a.] making straight, a straight line, a directing (toward anything), < dirigere, pp. directus, direct: see direct.] 1. Relative position considered without regard to linear distance.

The direction of a point, A, from another point, B, is or is not the same as the direction of a point, C, from another point, D, according as a straight line drawn from B through A and continued to infinity would or would not cut the celestial sphere at the same point as a straight line drawn from D through C and also continued to infinity. Every motion of a point has a determinate direction: for if any motion from any instant were to lose all curvature, it would tend toward a determinate point of the celestial sphere, which would define its direction at the instant when it ceased to be deflected. It is inaccurate to say that a line has a determinate direction, because a motion along that line has either one of two opposite directions. Yet the word direction is sometimes used in a loose sense in which, opposite directions not being distinguished, the direction of a line is spoken of, meaning the pair of opposite directions.

The direction of a star is seen at a glance, while the most profound science and the most accurate observations have not enabled the astronomer to ascertain its distance.

B. Peirce.

The direction in which a force tends to make the point to which it is applied move is called the direction of the force.

R. S. Ball. Exper. Mechanics, p. 5.

Hence—2. The act of governing; administration; management; guidance; superintendence: as, the direction of public affairs, of domestic concerns, of a bank, of conscience; to study under the direction of a tutor.

I put myself to thy direction.

Shak. Macbeth, IV. 3.

All nature is but art unknown to thee,
All chance, direction which thou canst not see.

Pope. Essay on Man, I. 281.

3. The act of directing, aiming, pointing, or applying: as, the direction of good works to a good end.—4. The end or object toward which something is directed.—5. An order; a prescription, either verbal or written; instruction in what manner to proceed.

Iago hath direction what to do.

Shak. Othello, II. 3.

The next day there was also a levy for the repairing two Forts: but that labour took not such effect as was intended, for want of good directions.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 140.

Follow but our direction, and we will accommodate matters.

Goldsmith. The Bee, No. 5.

6. In equity pleading, that part of the bill containing the allegations to the court.—7. In music, the act or office of a conductor or director.—8. A superscription, as on a letter or package, directing to whom and where it is to be sent; an address.

These letters [Lord Chesterfield's] retain their directions and wax seals, and bear the postmarks of the period.

N. and Q. 7th ser., II. 425.

9. A body or board of directors; a directorate.

—10. In astral., the difference of right or oblique ascension between the significator and promotor.—Angle of direction. See angle.—Direction cosine. the cosine of the angle which a given direction makes with that of one of a system of rectangular coordinates in space.—Direction of the dip. See dip.

—Direction ratio. the ratio of one of the three oblique coordinates of a point to the distance of the point from the origin.—Line of direction. (a) In geom., the direct line in which a piece is pointed. (b) In mech.: (1) The line in which a body moves or tends to proceed, according to the force impressed upon it. Thus, if a body falls freely by gravity, its line of direction is a line perpendicular to the horizon, or one which, if produced, would pass through the earth's center. (2) A line drawn from the center of gravity of any body perpendicular to the horizon.—Syn. 3. Oversight, government, control.

directional (di-rekt'-shn-al), a. [< direction + -al.] Pertaining or relating to direction.

The directional character of the properties of the ray, on account of its analogy to the directional character of a magnet or an electric current, suggested the idea of polarity.

Spectroscopic, Polarization, p. 5.

directional coefficient. See coefficient.

directitude (di-rekt'-ti-tud), n. A word used in burlesque in the following passage, which appears to contain some allusion not now intelligible.

3d Serv. Which friends, sir, (as it were,) durst not (look you, sir) show themselves (as we term it) his friends while he's in directitude.

1st Serv. Directitude! what's that? Shak. Cor., IV. 6.

directive (di-rekt'-tiv), a. [= F. directif = Sp. Pg. directivo = It. direttivo, < ML. directivus (in the phrase directiva littera, a letter addressed), < L. directus, pp. of dirigere, direct: see direct.] 1. Having the power of directing; causing to take or occupy a certain direction.

A compass-needle experiences from the earth's magnetism sensibly a couple (or directive) action, and is not sensibly attracted or repelled as a whole.

Thomson and Tait. Nat. Phil., § 583.

2. Pointing out the proper direction; guiding; prescribing; indicating.

Nor visited by one directive ray,

From cottage streaming, or from airy hall.

Thomson.

The very objects of speculative contemplation being selected and created under the directive influences of some deep-seated want.

G. H. Lewes. Probs. of Life and Mind, II. III. § 2.

It is the office of the inverse symbol to propose a question, not to describe an operation. It is, in its primary meaning, interrogative, not directive.

Bode. Differential Equations, p. 377.

3. Capable of being directed, managed, or handled.

Limbs are his instruments,

In no less working, than are swords and bows

Directive by the limbs.

Shak. T. and C., I. 2.

4. Dealing with direction: as, directive algebra.—Directive corpuscle. an apoblast (which see).

directly (di-rekt'), adv. 1. In a straight line or course, literally or figuratively; in the natural and primitive way: as, aim directly at the object; gravity tends directly to the center of the earth.

In mechanics a body is said to strike or impinge directly against another when the stroke is in a direction perpendicular to the surface at the point of contact.

Also, a sphere is said to strike directly against another when the line of direction passes through both their centers.

Two equal flat pencils in the same plane or parallel planes are said to be directly equal when they could be generated by equal displacements of rays, these displacements being in the same direction of rotation.

2. In a direct manner; without the intervention of any medium; immediately.

All (the ancient Greeks) who were qualified to vote at all voted directly, and not through representatives, in the greatest affairs of state.

E. A. Freeman. Amer. Lects., p. 273.

It is manifest that before the development of commerce, and while possession of land could alone give largeness of means, lordship and riches were directly connected.

H. Spencer. Prin. of Sociol., § 402.

3. Straightway; without delay; immediately; at once; presently: as, he will be with us directly.

He will directly to the lords, I fear.

Milton. S. A., I. 1250.

(In this sense directly, when it happens to precede a dependent temporal clause, often assumes, by the improper omission of the temporal conjunction when or as, the apparent office of a conjunction, "when," "as soon as." It is more common in English than in American use.

Directly he stopped, the coffin was removed by four men.

Dickens.

4. Clearly; unmistakably; expressly; without circumlocution or ambiguity.

That wise Solon was directly a Poet, it is manifest, having written in verse the notable fable of the Atlantick Island.

Str. P. Sidney. Apol. for Poetries.

We found our Sea cards most directly false.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 109.

I never directly defame, but I do what is as bad in the consequence.

Steele. Spectator, No. 136.

Directly proportional, in math. See proportional.—Syn. 3. Promptly, instantly, quickly.—4. Absolutely, unambiguously.

directness (di-rekt'-nes), n. 1. Straightness; a straight course. Sheridan.—2. Straightforwardness; openness; freedom from ambiguity.

I like much their robust simplicity, their veracity, directness of conception.

director (di-rekt'-tor), n. [= F. directeur (> D. directeur = Dan. Sw. direktör) = G. director = Sp. Pg. director = It. direttore, < NL. director, < L. dirigere, pp. directus, direct: see direct.] 1. One who directs; one who guides, superintends, governs, or manages.

Nature hath some director of infinite knowledge to guide her in all her ways.

Hooker. Eccles. Polity, I. 2.

Specifically—(a) One of a number of persons, appointed or elected under provision of law, having authority to manage and direct the affairs of a corporation or company. All the directors collectively constitute a board of directors.

They are agents of the corporation, and not of the stockholders. Generally they are elected for one year. (b) In music, the leader or conductor of a company of vocal or instrumental performers: as, a choir director; an orchestral director.

2. Anything that directs or controls.

Common forms were not designed Directors to a noble mind.

Swift.

Safety from external danger is the most powerful director of national conduct.

A. Hamilton.

Specifically—(a) In surg., a grooved probe, intended to direct the edge of the knife or scissors in opening sinuses or fistulas or making incisions generally. (b) In elect., a metallic instrument on a glass handle connected by a chain with the pole of a battery, and applied to the part of the body to which a shock is to be sent.—Director circle. See circle.

Sometimes spelled directer.

directorate (di-rekt'-tō-rāt), n. [= F. directorat; as director + -atē.] 1. The office of a director.

—2. A body of directors.

directorial (di-rekt'-tō-rī-al), a. [< director + -ial.] 1. That directs; invested with direction, or control.

The emperor's power in the collective body, or the diet, is not directorial, but executive.

W. Guthrie. Geog. Germany.

2. Belonging to a director or a body of directors, as the French Directory.

directorize (di-rekt'-tō-rī-z), v. t. [< director + -ize.] To bring under the power or authority of a directory (in the extract, of the Presbyterian Directory for Public Worship).

These were to do the Journey work of Presbytery, . . . undertaking to Directorize, to Unlutterize, to Catechize, and to Discipline their Brethren.

Bp. Gauden. Tears of the Church, p. 608.

directorship (di-rekt'-tō-rī-ship), n. [< director + -ship.] The condition or office of a director.

directory (di-rekt'-tō-rī), a. and n. [= F. directeur = Sp. Pg. directorio = It. direttorio, < LL. directorium, serving to direct, ML. NL. neut. directorium, a directory, < L. directus, pp. of dirigere, direct: see direct.] 1. a. Guiding or directing; directive.

This needle the mariners call their directory needle.

J. Gregory. Posthumus (1650), p. 281.

I must practice a general directory and revivory power in the matter.

Lincoln. in Raymond, p. 361.

Directory statute. a statute or part of a statute which operates merely as advice or direction to the official or other person who is to do something pointed out, leaving the act or omission not destructive of the legality of what is done in disregard of the direction.

Bishop.

II. n.; pl. directories (-rī-z). 1. A guide; a rule to direct; particularly (eccles.), a book of directions for saying the various church offices and for finding the changes in them required by the calendar; especially, in medieval English usage, a book of directions for saying the hours. Also called ordinal, pica, or pica. The directory of the Greek Church is called the typicon.

There may be usefully set forth by the Church a common directory of public prayer, especially in the administration of the Sacraments.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnua.

"So pray ye," or after this manner: which if we expound only to the sense of becoming a pattern, or a directory, it is observable that it is not only directory for the matter but for the manner too.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1836), II. 278.

The principal ecclesiastical directories are: (1) The set of rules drawn up in 1644 by the Westminster Assembly of Divines, to take the place of the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England, ratified by Parliament in 1645, and adopted by the Scottish General Assembly the same year. (2) In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a list, drawn up by authority of the bishop, containing directions as to the mass and office to be said on each day of the year. The number of feasts in the present calendar, and the frequent necessity of transferring some, commemorating or omitting others, makes the Directorium (or, as it is usually called, the Ordo) necessary for the clergy. The "Catholic Directory," familiar to English Catholics, contains, besides the Ordo, a list of clergy, churches, etc. An annual called the "Catholic Directory" occupies the same field in the United States as the English Directory. Cath. Dict.

Specifically—2. A book containing an alphabetical list of the inhabitants of a city, town, district, or the like, with their occupation, place of business, and abode.—3. A board of directors; a directorate. Specifically—4. [esp.] The body constituting the executive in France during a part of the revolutionary epoch, consisting of five members called directors, one of whom retired each year. Succeeding the government of the Convention, it existed from October, 1795, to November 9th, 1799, when it was overthrown by Napoleon Bonaparte (coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire), and succeeded by the Consulate. Under the Directory the legislative power was vested in a Council of Ancients, or Senate, of 250 members, composed of men above forty years of age, and a Council of Five Hundred, or Lower House, with which rested the initiative in legislation.

directrix (di-rek'-triks), n. [= F. directrice = It. direttrice, < NL. directrix, fem. of director: see director.] 1. A woman who governs or directs.—2. In math., a fixed line, whether straight or not, that is required for the description of a curve or surface.—3. In gun., the center line in the plane of fire of an embrasure or platform. Tidball. See embrasure.—Directrix of a conic, a line from which the distance of the variable point on the conic bears a constant ratio to the distance of the same point from a given focus; the polar of a focus.—Directrix of electrodynamic action of a given circuit, the magnetic force due to the circuit.

direful (dir'-fūl), a. [< dire + -ful, l. irreg. suffixed to an adj.] Characterized by or fraught with something dreadful; of a dire nature or appearance: as, a direful fiend; a direful misfortune.

Saturn combust,
With direful looks at your nativity,
Behold fair Venus in her silver orb.
Greene, James IV., l.

direfully (dir'-fūl-i), adv. Dreadfully; terribly; woefully.

direfulness (dir'-fūl-nes), n. The state of being direful; dreadfulness; calamitousness.

The direfulness of this pestilence is more emphatically set forth in these few words than in forty such odes as Sprat's on the plague at Athens. J. Warton, Essay on Pope.

dirily (dir'-li), adv. In a dire manner; fearfully.

And of his death he dirily had foretold.
Drayton, David and Goliath.

dirempt (di-rempt'), v. t. [< L. diremptus, pp. of dirimere (> It. dirimere = Sp. Pg. dirimir = F. dirimer), take apart, part, separate, < dis, apart, + emere, take. (cf. udempt, exempt, redemption).] To separate by violence; put asunder; break off.

He writ the judicial examination for a prouiso: that if either part refused to stand to his arbitrement, the doubtful strife might be dirempt by sentence.
Holinshead, Conquest of Ireland, xxiii.

dirempt (di-rempt'), a. [< L. diremptus, pp.: see the verb.] Parted; separated. Stow.

diremption (di-rempt'-shon), n. [< L. diremptio (n.), < dirimere, pp. dirimptus, separate: see dirempt.] 1. A forcible separation; a tearing asunder. [Rare.]—2. In bot., same as chorisis. [Not used.]

direness (dir'-nes), n. Terribleness; horrible-ness; fearfulness.

Dirness, familiar to my slaughterous thoughts, Cannot once start me.
Shak., Macbeth, v. 5.

direption (di-rep'-shon), n. [< L. direptio (n.), < diripere, pp. diripitus, tear asunder or away, ravage, < dis for dis, asunder, + ripere, snatch. cf. corruption.] A plundering or ravaging; robbery.

This lord for some direptions being cast Into close prison.

Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 61a.

You shall "suffer with joy the direption of your goods," because the best part of your substance is in heaven.
J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1868), II. 128.

direptitious (dir-ep-tish'-us), a. [After surreptitious (q. v.), < L. direptus, pp. of diripere, tear away: see direption.] Relating to or of the nature of direption. E. D.

direptitiously (dir-ep-tish'-us-li), adv. By way of direption or robbery.

Grants surreptitiously and direptitiously obtained.
Styrie, Memorials, no. 1632.

dirge (dérj), n. [Sc. also dirgie, etc. (see dirgie); < ME. dirge, dirge, dirge, dirgie, dergy, funeral service, the office for the dead; so called from an antiphon therein sung beginning "Dirige, Domine, Deus meus, in conspectu tuo viam meam" (Direct, O Lord my God, my way in thy sight), the words being taken from the Psalms ("Domine . . . dirige in conspectu tuo viam meam"; Vulgate, Ps. v. 8): L. dirige, impv. of dirigere, make straight, direct: see direct. In ME. the dirge or dirgie is often mentioned in connection with the placido, so named for a similar reason.] A funeral hymn; the funeral service as sung; hence, a song or tune expressing grief, lamentation, and mourning.

Recort, I pray you, vnto my sepulture,
To sing my dirge with great deuotion.
Lamentation of Mary Magdalene, l. 641.

And ouer y<sup>e</sup> he ordeyned ther, to be continued for euer, one day in y<sup>e</sup> weke, a solenne dirge to be songe, and vpon y<sup>e</sup> morowe a masse.
Fabyan, Chron., an. 1432.

With mirth in funeral, and with dirge in marriage,
In equal scale weighing delight and dole.

First will I sing thy dirge,
Then kiss thy pale lips, and then die myself.
Bea., and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, iv. 4.

As the first anthem at matins commenced with "Dirige," . . . the whole of the morning's service, including the Mass, came to be designated a "Dirge" or Dirge.
Book, Church of our Fathers, II. 508.

=Syn. Dirge, Requiem, Elegy, lament, threnody, cor-nach. The first three are primarily and almost uniformly suggested by the death of some person. A dirge or a requiem may be only music or may be a song. An elegy is a poem, which may or may not be sung. A requiem, being originally sung for the repose of the soul of a deceased person, retains a corresponding character when the music does not accompany words.

A dark-haired virgin train Chanted the death-dirge of the slain.
Longfellow, Burial of the Minnikink.

The silent organ loudest chaunts
The master's requiem.
Emerson, Dirge.
Now change your praises into piteous cries,
And Eulogies turne into Elegies.

dirge-ale (dérj'-āle), n. A wake, or funeral gathering, at which ale was served. Also called soul-ale. See dirgie.

With them the superfluous numbers of idle wakes, guilds, fraternities, church-ales, helpe-ales, and soule-ales, called also dirge-ales, with the heathenish rioting at bride-ales, are well diminished and laid aside.
Holinshead, Description of England, II. 1.

dirgee, n. See dirgie.

dirgeful (dérj'-fūl), a. [< dirge + -ful, l.] Funeral; walling; mournful.

Soothed sadly by the dirgeful wind.
Coleridge.

dirgie (dér'-ji), n. [Sc., also written dergie, dergy, and transposed dirgie, drogie, dredgie, = E. dirge, < ME. dirge, dirge, dirgie, dergy, etc., the service for the dead: see dirge.] A funeral company; entertainment at a funeral. Selden.

It. dirigente*, < L. dirigen (-t), pp. of dirigere, direct: see direct.] I. a. Directing; serving to direct: formerly applied, in chemistry, to certain ingredients in prescriptions which were supposed to guide the action of the rest.

II. n. In geom., the line of motion along which the descript line or surface is carried in the generation of any plane or solid figure; the directrix.

dirigible (dir'-i-jl), a. [< *L. as if *dirigibilis*, < dirigere, direct: see direct.] That may be directed, controlled, or steered.

It is stated by the London "Engineering" that a dirigible balloon of colossal dimensions has been for some time in course of construction in Berlin. Science, VIII. 357.

dirigo (dir'-i-gō), [L.: 1st pers. sing. pres. ind. act. of dirigere, direct: see direct.] I guide or direct: the motto on the arms of the State of Maine.

dirigo-motor (dir'-i-gō-mō'tor), a. Productive of muscular motion, and directing that motion to an end.

Certain inferior dirigo-motor acts are unconscious; but omitting these, the law is that with each muscular contraction there goes a sensation more or less definite.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 46.

diriment (dir'-i-mēt), a. [< L. dirimen (-t), pp. of dirimere: see dirempt, v.] Nullifying.—Diriment impediments of marriage, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., such impediments as render marriage null and void from the very beginning, as consanguinity, affinity, certain crimes, etc.

Bishops . . . may often dispense from certain diriment impediments as apostolic delegates. Cath. Dict., p. 493.

dirkl (dérk), n. [Formerly also dark; < Ir. dúire, a dirk, poniard.] A stabbing weapon; a dagger.

Especially—(a) The long and heavy dagger worn as a part of the equipment of the dunwall, or gentleman, among the Celtic Highlanders of Scotland. It had different forms at different times. The more modern style has a scabbard with one or two minor sheaths in it for small knives.

He took the engagement . . . in the only mode and form which . . . he considered as binding—he swore secrecy upon his drawn dirk.

Scott, Waverley, lrv.

(b) The common side-arm of a midshipman in the British naval service. It is usually straight, but is sometimes a very short, curved cut-throat.

dirkl (dérk), v. t. [< dirkl, n.] To poniard; stab.

I thought of the Ruthvens that were dirked in their ain house, for it may be as small a forfeit.

Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, III.

And dirked his foe with his own hand.
The Century, XXVII. 329.

dirkl (dérk), a., n., adv., and v. An occasional Middle English and Scotch form of dark. Chaucer.

I praye thee, speake not so dirke;
Such myster sayinge the seemeth to mirke.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

dirk-knife (dérk'-nif), n. A large clasp-knife with a dirk-like blade.

dirkness, n. An obsolete form of darkness. Chaucer.

diril (diril), v. i. [Sc., = E. drill, pierce: see drill, thrill.] 1. To thrill.—2. To vibrate or shake, especially with reverberation; tremble.

He screwed his pipes and gart them skirl,
Till roof and rafters a' did diril.
Burns, Tam o' Shanter.

diril (diril), n. [< diril, v.] A blow such as produces a tingling sensation or a quivering sound; the sensation or sound itself; vibration. [Scotch.]

I threw a noble throw at ane; . . .
It just played diril on the bone.
Burns, Death and Dr. Hornbook.

Dirochelyoides (di-rok'-e-li-oi'dēs), n. pl. [NL., < Di-rochelya + -oides.] A subfamily of tortoises, named by Agassiz, in the form Di-rochelyoides, in his family Emydoida, from the genus Di-rochelya.

Dirochelys (di-rok'-e-lis), n. [NL., < Gr. deep, neck, + χελυς, tortoise.] A genus of tortoises, alone representing the Dirochelyoida, having an elongated flexible neck, webbed feet, and a movable plastron. Also Di-rochelya.

dir (dér), n. and a. [Formerly also spelled durt; transposed from ME. drit (= MD. drit, D. dret = locl. drit, mod. drit), excrement: see drit, drie.] I. n. 1. Any foul or filthy substance, as excrement, mud, mire, or pitch; whatever, adhering to anything, renders it foul, unclean, or offensive.

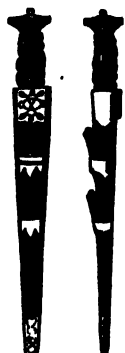

The wicked are like the troubled sea, . . . whose waters cast up mire and dirt.
Isa. lvii. 26.

And being downe, is trodde in the dirt
Of castell, and brouned, and sorely hurt.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., February.

Then shouldst have heard . . . how he beat me because her horse stumbled; how she waded through the dirt to pluck him off me.
Shak., T. of the B., iv. 1.

2. Earth, especially loose earth; disintegrated soil, as in gardens; hence, any detrital or disintegrated material. [Colloq., U. S.]

The love of dirt is among the earliest passions.
C. D. Warner, My Summer in a Garden.

Front and Side Views of a Scottish Highland Dirk.

The common qualities of copper give off a great deal of sulphur matter known as dirt.

J. W. Truett, Electrotyping, p. 120.

Specifically—3. In placer-mining, the detrital material (usually sand and gravel) from which the gold is separated by washing.

The miners talk of rich dirt and poor dirt, and of stripping off so many feet of top dirt before getting to pay dirt, the latter meaning dirt with so much gold in it that it will pay to dig it up and wash it. Borthwick, California, p. 120.

4. Meanness; sordidness; baseness.

Honours which are . . . sometimes thrown away upon dirt and infamy. W. Melmoth, tr. of Pilny, vii. 30.

5. Abusive or scurrilous language.—Pay dirt, earth containing a remunerative quantity of gold. See extract under def. 2.—To cast dirt, to submit to some degrading humiliation; swallow one's own words.—To sling dirt at, to attack with scurrilous abuse, as an opponent.

II. a. Consisting or made of loose earth; as, a dirt road (a road not paved or macadamized). [Colloq., U. S.] dirt (dér't), v. t. [dirt, n. Cf. dirt, dirty, v.] To make foul or filthy; soil; befoul; dirty. [Rare, except in colloq. use.]

Ill company is like a dog, who dirt's most those whom he loves best. Swift.

Mosques are also closed in rainy weather (excepting at the times of prayer), lest persons who have no shoes should enter and dirt the pavement and matting. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, i. 90.

dirt-bed (dér't'bed), n. In geol., any stratum in which the remains of an ancient soil are conspicuous. The most remarkable dirt-beds are in the Purbeckian group, a fresh- and brackish-water formation at the summit of the Jurassic series. In this group, so named from the Isle of Purbeck in England, where the stratum is best developed, there are layers of ancient soil containing the stumps of trees which once grew in them.

dirt-board (dér't'bórd), n. In a vehicle, a board placed so as to keep the axle-arm free from dirt.

dirt-cheap (dér't'chép), a. As cheap as dirt; very cheap. [Colloq.]

I weigh my words when I say that if the nation could purchase a potential Watt, or Davy, or Faraday, at the cost of a hundred thousand pounds down, he would be dirt-cheap at the money. Huxley, Tech. Education.

dirt-eating (dér't'ē'ting), n. 1. The practice of some savage or barbarous tribes, as the Otomacs of South America, of using certain kinds of clay for food; geophagism.—2. Cachexia Africana, a disorder of the nutritive functions among negroes, and in certain kinds of disturbances of health among women, in which there is a morbid craving to eat dirt.

dirty (dér't'i-lī), adv. [dirt, a.] 1. In a dirty manner; foully; nastily; filthily.—2. Meanly; sordidly; by low means.

Dirty and desperately gull'd. Donne, Elegies, xii.

dirtyness (dér't'i-nes), n. 1. The state of being dirty; filthiness; foulness; nastiness.

Paris, which before that time was called Lutetia, because of the mudde and dirtyness of the place wherein it standeth. Strut, The Romans, an. 300.

If gentlemen would regard the virtues of their ancestors . . . this degenerate wantonness and dirtyness of speech would return to the dughill. Barrow, Works, i. xiii.

His [a collier's] high wages arise altogether from the hardship, disagreeableness, and dirtyness of his work. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, i. 10.

2. Meanness; baseness; sordidness.—3. Sloppiness; muddiness; uncomfortableness: as, the dirtyness of the weather.

For thine, my dear Dick, give me leave to speak plain, Like a very foul mop, dirtier than they clean. Swift.

2. To soil or tarnish morally; sully.

If our fortune . . . be great, public experience hath made remembrance, that it mingles with the world, and dirties those fingers which are instrumental in consecration. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1836), I. 78.

dirty-alien (dér't'i-al'en), n. [E. dial., < dirty + alien, var. of aulin, q. v.] A local English name of the dung-bird.

disruption (di-rup'shqn), n. [L. disruptio (n), < disruptere or disrumpere, pp. disruptus, break apart: see disrupt.] A bursting or rending asunder. See disruption.

dis (dis), n. [L., related, but prob. not directly, with dis (dís), contr. of divēs (dív'is), rich (cf. Pluto, < Gr. Πλούτων, as related to πλούτος, rich), both akin to divus, divine, divine, deus, a god: see deity.] In Rom. myth., a name sometimes given to Pluto, and hence to the infernal world.

Since they did plot The means that dusky Dido might compass her got, Her and her blind boy's scandal'd company I have forsworn. Shak., Tempest, IV. 1.

dis- [ME. dis, dis-, OF. des, dis-, de-, F. des-, dis-, de- = Sp. dis-, des-, dis- = It. dis-, des-, s- (the Rom. forms varying according to position, age, or other circumstances, and often coexisting), < L. dis-, an inseparable prefix, remaining unchanged before c, p, q, s, and t (and sometimes g, h, j, and r in ML. at will, and hence in Rom., etc., in all positions), and usually before a vowel, regularly changed to di- before b, d, g, j, l, m, n, r, and v, to di- before f, to di- before a vowel (as in dirigere and dirimere: see dirimp), orig. 'in two,' hence 'apart,' 'asunder,' etc. (connected with his, orig. **dis* = Gr. dis, twice), < duo = Gr. duo = E. two: see di-, di-, di-, and two. In ML. and Rom. the prefixes dis- (OF. des-, dis-) and de- (OF. de-, often written des-, def-, etc.) in the separative and privative senses were often used interchangeably; hence many words having original L. de- may appear in the modern languages with dis- (dis-, etc.), while others having original L. dis- (dis-, etc.) may appear with de-; cf. defer = dis-, defame, deform, defy, etc., in which de- and dis- are involved. The prefix dis-, in ME. almost indifferently dis- or des-, becomes in mod. E. exclusively dis- (when not reduced to or merged with de-), except in a few words in which the force of the prefix is less obvious, and the archaic form des- accordingly remains in use along with the regular modern form dis-, as in discent, deceant, dispatch, despatch.] A prefix of Latin origin (in other forms di-, dis-), in force—(1) separative or disjunctive, 'apart,' 'asunder,' 'in different directions,' etc., as in disband, dispart, disident, etc., this force being often only indistinctly felt in the English word, as in dispose, disent, disfract, etc., and passing even in Latin into a merely intensive use, not felt at all in English, as in dispute; (2) privative or negative, like the English un-, reversing or negating the primitive, as in dis-similar, etc., having come, in this use, from its frequency in Middle Latin and Old French, to be recognized as a regular English prefix, and as such usable with almost any verb and adjective, as in disable, discontent, disfavor, disoblige, disfellowship, etc., and in colloquial or dialectal use in such forms as disremember, disrespect, etc. In some words the prefix dis- was early reduced by aphesis to s-, a form common in Italian, and seen in English in spend, spay, spout, etc., as compared with dispend, dispay, disput, etc.

dis- An abbreviation of discount.

disability (dis-a-bil'i-ti), n.; pl. disabilities (dis-a-bil'i-ti), n.; pl. disabilities. [= It. disabilitá; as dis-priv. + ability.]

1. Want of competent power, strength, or physical or mental ability; weakness; incapacity; impotence: as, disability arising from infirmity; a blind person labors under great disability.

The debate . . . in the House of Commons began at nine o'clock in the morning, and continued till after midnight, without interruption. . . . "Many," says Clarendon, "withdrew from pure faintness, and disability to attend the conclusion." Beveridge, Orations, II. 121.

Chatham refused to see him, pleading his disability. Benbow.

Specifically—2. Want of competent means or instruments.—3. Want of legal capacity or qualification; legal incapacity; incapacity to do an act with legal effect.

This disadvantage which the Dissenters at present lie under, of a disability to receive Church preferments, will be easily remedied by the repeal of the test. Swift.

The pagan laws during the empire had been continually repealing the old disabilities of women, and the legislative movement in their favour continued with unabated force from Constantine to Justinian, and appeared also in some of the early laws of the barbarians. Locky, Europ. Morals, II. 268.

—Syn. Disability, Inability, incompetence, incapacity, disqualification, unfitness. Disability implies deprivation or loss of power; inability indicates rather inherent want of power. One declines an office from inability to discharge its duties, but is not elected to it because of some external disability qualifying him for being chosen.

disable (dis-a-blē), v. t.; pret. and pp. disabled, ppr. disabling. [dis-priv. + able, v.] 1. To render unable; deprive of ability, physical, mental, or legal; weaken or destroy the capability of; cripple or incapacitate: as, a ship is disabled by a storm or a battle; a race-horse is disabled by lameness; loss of memory disables a teacher.

A Christian's life is a perpetual exercise, a wrestling and warfare, for which sensual pleasure disables him. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living.

An attainder of the ancestor corrupts the blood, and disables his children to inherit. Blackstone.

A single State or a minority of States ought to be disabled to resist the will of the majority. N. Webster, in Souther, p. 120.

I hope this will not disaccommodate you. Warburton, To Hurd, Letters, cxvii.

disaccommodation (dis-a-kom'ō-dā'shqn), n. [dis-priv. + accommodation.] The state of being unfit, unsuited, or unprepared.

They were such as were great and notable devastations, sometimes in one part of the earth, sometimes in another; . . . in some places more than in other, according to the accommodation or disaccommodation of them to such calamities. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 217.

disaccord (dis-a-kórd'), v. t. [OF. desaccorder, desaccorder, F. désaccorder, < des-priv. + accorder, agree: see dis- and accord, v.] To disagree; refuse assent.

But she did disaccord,
No could her liking to his love apply.
Spenser, F. Q. VI. III. 7.
Nothing can more disaccord with our experience than the assertion that our thoughts and desires never do or can intervene as causes in the events of our lives.
Nietz, Nature and Thought, p. 212.

disaccordant (dis-a-kôr'dant), a. [< OF. des-accordant, desaccordant, ppr. of desaccorder, desaccorder, disagree: see disaccord, and cf. accor-dant.] Not agreeing; not accordant.

disaccustom (dis-a-kus'tom), v. t. [Formerly also disaccustom; < OF. desaccoustumer, F. desaccoutumer (= Sp. desacostumar = Pg. desaccostumar), < des-priv. + accoustumer, accustom: see dis- and accustom, v.] To cause to lose a habit by disuse; render unaccustomed as by disuse:
as, he has disaccustomed himself to exercise.

disacidify (dis-a-sid'i-fy), v. t.; pret. and pp.
disacidified, ppr. disacidifying. [= F. désacidi-fier; as dis-priv. + acidify.] To deprive of acidity; free from acid: neutralize the acid present in. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

Kingsley, Alton Locke, xiv.

His open and manly style did much to relieve him from disagreeables.

Quarterly Rev., LXXXIII. 422.

disagreeableness (dis-a-gré-a-bl'i-ness), n. The state or quality of being disagreeable. (a.) Unsuitableness; incongruity; contrariety. [Rare.] (b.) Unpleasantness; offensiveness to the mind or to the senses: as, the disagreeableness of another's manners; the disagreeableness of a taste, sound, or smell.

Many who have figured Solitude, having set out the most noted properties thereof, have sought to sweeten all they could the disagreeableness.

W. Montague, Devout Essays, I. xvi. 1.

disagreeably (dis-a-gré-a-bl'i), adv. In a disagreeable manner or degree; unsuitably; unpleasantly; offensively.

His [Bourlaigue's] style is verbose, he is disagreeably full of quotations from the fathers, and he wants imagination.

Blair, Rhetoric, xlix.

disagreement (dis-a-gré-ment), n. [dis- + agree + -ment.] Disagreement.

There is no disagreement where is faith in Jesus Christ and consent of mind together in one accord.

J. Udall, On Acts viii.

disagreement (dis-a-gré-ment), n. [dis- + agree + -ment. Cf. F. désaccord, disagreeableness, defect.] 1. Want of agreement; difference, either in form or in essence; dissimilitude; diversity; unlikeness: as, the disagreement of two ideas, of two stories, or of any two objects in some respects similar.

These carry . . . plain and evident notes and characters either of disagreement or affinity.

Woodward.

2. Difference of opinion or sentiments.

As touching their several opinions about the necessity of sacraments, . . . in truth their disagreement is not great.

Hocher, Eccles. Polity.

To account, by any current hypothesis, for the numberless disagreements in men's ideas of right and wrong . . . seems scarcely possible.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 471.

3. Unsuitableness; unfitness; lack of conformity.

From these different relations of different things there necessarily arises an agreement or disagreement of some things to others.

Clarke, On the Attributes, xiv.

4. A falling out; a wrangle; contention.

His resignation was owing to a disagreement with his brother-in-law and coadjutor, Sir Robert Walpole, which had long subsisted.

Cozz.

— Syn. 1. Distinction, Diversity, etc. (see difference); unlikeness, discrepancy. — 4. Variance, misunderstanding, dissension, division, dispute, jarring, clashing, strife.

disalliege (dis-a-léj'), v. t. [dis- + priv. + allege (influenced by liege) for allege, a verb assumed from allegiance.] To alienate from allegiance.

And what greater dividing then by a pernicious and hostile peace to disalliege a whole feodary kingdom from the ancient dominion of England?

Milton, Art. of Peace with Irish.

disallow (dis-a-lou'), v. [dis- + ME. disallowen, < OF. desaler, desaler, desaler, < ML. disalloare, mixed with disallaudare, written (after OF.) disalloudare, disallow, < L. dis- + priv. + ML. allocare, assign, allow, L. allaudare, praise, ML. approve, allow, > OF. alouer, allow: see dis- and allow, allow.] 1. To refuse or withhold permission to or for; refuse to allow, sanction, grant, or authorize; disapprove: as, to disallow items in an account.

It is pite that those which have authority and charge to allow and disallow booke to be printed be no more circumspect herein than they are.

Ackson, The Scholemaster, p. 79.

They disallowed self-defence, second marriages, and usury.

Bentley, Freethinking, § 11.

2. To decline or refuse to receive; reject; disown.

To whom coming as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious.

1 Pet. II. 4.

They disallowed the fine books of Moses.

Purchase, Pilgrimage, p. 148.

— Syn. To prohibit, forbid, condemn, set aside, repudiate. II. trans. To refuse allowance or toleration; withhold sanction.

What follows if we disallow of this?

Shak., K. John, I. 1.

He returns againe to disallow of that Reformation which the Covenant vows, as being the partiall advice of a few Divines.

Milton, Ekikonklastos, xliii.

disallowable (dis-a-lou-a-bl'), a. [dis- + priv. + allowable.] Not allowable; not to be sanctioned or permitted.

That he [Murd] had used dancing in Asia, where he was governor for a season, which deed was so disallowable that he durst not defend it for well done, but stiffly denied.

Piers, Instruction of a Christian Woman, I. 12.

disallowableness (dis-a-lou-a-bl'i-ness), n. The state of being disallowable. Adj.

disallowance (dis-a-lou-ans), n. [dis- + allow + -ance, after allowance.] Disapprobation; refusal to admit or sanction; prohibition; rejection.

God accepts of a thing suitable for him to receive, and for us to give, where he does not declare his refusal and disallowance of it.

South.

The disallowance of the Anti-Chinese Bill the other day is another source of dissatisfaction to her [British Columbia].

N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 47.

disally (dis-a-li'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disallied, ppr. disallying. [dis- + ally.] To disregard or undo the alliance of.

Nor loth so loosely disallied

Their nuptials. Milton, R. A., I. 1022.

disaltern, v. t. [dis- + altern.] To refuse to alternate, or to permit in alternation.

But must I ever grind? and must I earn Nothing but stripes? O wilt thou disaltern The rest thou gav'st? Quarles, Rumblers, III. 4.

disamis (dis-a-mis), n. The mnemonic name given by Petrus Hispanus to that mood of the third figure of syllogism of which the major premise is a particular affirmative and the minor premise a universal affirmative proposition. The following is an example: Some acts of homicide are laudable, but all acts of homicide are cruel; therefore, some cruel acts are laudable. The vowels of the word, i, a, i, show the quantity and quality of the propositions; the initial letter, d, shows that the mood is to be reduced to darii; the two s's show that the major premise and conclusion are to be simply converted in the reduction; and the letter m shows that the premises are to be transposed. Thus every letter of the word is significant. See barbara.

disanalogal (dis-a-nal'-g-al), a. [dis- + priv. + analogal.] Not analogous.

The idea or image of that knowledge which we have in ourselves . . . is utterly unanalogous and disanalogal to that knowledge which is in God.

Sir M. Hale, Works of God.

disanchor (dis-ang'-kor), v. t. [dis- + priv. + anchor.] To free or force from the anchor, as a ship; weigh the anchor of.

The saill raised vp, the winde softe gan blow, Anon disanched the shippes in a throw [brief space].

Rom. of Partheny (E. E. 8.), I. 830.

disangelical (dis-an-jel'-i-kal), a. [dis- + priv. + angelical.] Not angelical; carnal; gross.

That learned casuist . . . who accounts for the shame attending these pleasures of the sixth sense, as he is pleased to call them, from their disangelical nature.

Country, Philemon to Hydaspes, II.

disanimate (dis-an-i-mât), v. t.; pret. and pp. disanimated, ppr. disanimating. [dis- + priv. + animate.] 1. To deprive of life.

That soul and life that is now fled and gone from a lifeless carcase is only a loss to the particular body of companies of matter, which by means thereof is now disanimated.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 22.

2. To deprive of spirit or courage; discourage; dishearten; deject. [Rare.]

The presence of a king engenders love Amongst his subjects and his loyal friends, As it disanimates his enemies.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., III. 1.

disanimation (dis-an-i-mâ'-shon), n. [dis- + animate: see -ation.] 1. Privation of life.

True it is, that a glowworm will afford a faint light almost a day's space when many will conceive it dead; but this is a mistake in the compute of death and term of disanimation.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 27.

2. The act of discouraging; depression of spirits. [Rare.]

disannex (dis-a-neks'), v. t. [dis- + annex.] To separate; disunite; diajoin.

That when the provinces were lost and disannexed, and that the king was but king de jure over them and not de facto, yet nevertheless the privilege of naturalization continued.

State Trials, Case of the Postnati (1605).

disannul (dis-a-nul'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disannulled, ppr. disannulling. [dis- + annul, here intensive (like an- in annulose), + annul.] 1. To make void; annul; deprive of force or authority; cancel.

Whosoever laws he [God] hath made they ought to stand, unless himself from Heaven proclaim them disannulled, because it is not in man to correct the ordinance of God.

Hocher, Eccles. Polity, III. 10.

Now, trust me, were it not against our laws, Against my crown, my oath, my dignity, Which princea would they, may not disannul, My soul should sue as advocate for thee.

Shak., C. of E., I. 1.

That rude law is torne And disannul'd, as too too inhumane.

Marston, Scourge of Villanie, Sat. II.

2. To deprive (of). [Rare.]

Are we disannul'd of our first sleep, and cheated of our dreams and fantasies?

Middleton, The Black Book.

disannuller (dis-a-nul'-ér), n. One who disannuls, annuls, or cancels.

Another, to her over-lasting fame, erected
Two alo-house of ease; the quater seasons Running against her roundly; in which business
Two of the disannullers lost their night-caps.
Fletcher, Tamer Tamed, II. 5.

disannulment (dis-a-nul'ment), n. [< disannul + -ment.] Annulment.

disanoint (dis-a-noint'), v. t. [< dis-priv. + anoint.] To render invalid the consecration of; deprive of the honor of being anointed.

They have juggled and paltered with the world, banded and borne arms against their king, divested him. dis- anointed him, nay cursed him all over in their pulpits.
Milton, Tenure of Kings and Magistrates.

disapparel (dis-a-par'el), v. t.; pret. and pp. dis- appareled or disappareled, ppr. disappareling or disapparelling. [< OF. desappareiller, desapa- reiller, desappareiller, F. desappareiller (=Sp.
+ appareiller, appareiller, appareil: see dis- and apparel, v.] To disrobe; strip of raiment.

Drink disappareled the soul, and is the betrayer of the mind.
P. Junius, Stigmatised (1685), p. 81.

disappear (dis-a-pēr'), v. i. [< OF. desaperer, <
des-priv. + aperer, appear: see dis- and appear.
Cf. F. disparaitre (< L. as if "disparecere"), OF.
disparoitre, desparoitre = Sp. desaparecer
= Pg. desapparecer (< ML. as if "disapparecere")
= It. sparire (< ML. disparere: see disparition), of similar ult. formation.] 1. To vanish from or pass out of sight; recede from view; cease to appear; be no longer seen.

The pictures drawn in our minds are laid in fading colours, and, if not sometimes refreshed, vanish and disap- pear.
Locke.

This is the way of the mass of mankind in all ages, to be influenced by sudden fears, sudden contrition, sudden earnestness, sudden resolves, which disappear as suddenly.
J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 284.

The black earth yawns: the mortal disappears:
Ashes to ashes, dust to dust.
Tennyson, Death of Wellington.

2. To pass out of existence or out of knowledge; cease to exist or to be known: as, the epidemic has disappeared.

The Cretaceous Dinosaurs and Cephalopods disappear without progeny, though one knows no reason why they might not still live on the Pacific Coast.
Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 226.

3. To end somewhat gradually or without abrupt termination: as, the path disappeared in the depths of the forest; in entom., a line on the wing disappearing at the subcostal vein.

disappearance (dis-a-pēr'ans), n. [< disappear + -ance. Cf. appearance.] The act of disappearing; removal or withdrawal from sight or knowledge; a ceasing to appear or to exist:
as, the disappearance of the sun, or of a race of animals.

A few days after Christ's disappearance out of the world, we find an assembly of disciples at Jerusalem, to the number of "about one hundred and twenty."
Paley, Evidences, II. 2.

disappendency (dis-a-pen'den-si), n. [< dis- priv. + appendency.] Detachment from a former connection; separation. Burns.

disappoint (dis-a-point'), v. t. [< OF. desapoint- er, desapointier, F. desapointier, disappoint, < des-priv. + appointer, appoint: see dis- and appoint.] 1. To frustrate the desire or expectation of; balk or thwart in regard to something intended, expected, or wished; defeat the aim or will of: as, do not disappoint us by staying away; to be disappointed in or of one's hopes, or about the weather.

Arise, O Lord, disappoint him, cast him down: deliver my soul from the wicked.
Ps. xvii. 13.
Being thus disappointed of our purpose, we gathered the fruit we found ripe.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 101.

I have such confidence in your reason that I should be greatly disappointed if I were to find it wanting.
H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrim, p. 474.

2. To defeat the realization or fulfilment of; frustrate; balk; foil; thwart: as, to disappoint
a man's hopes or plans.

He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise.
Job v. 12.

Without counsel purposes are disappointed. Prov. xv. 22.
3. To hinder of intended effect; frustrate; foil.
Many times what man doth determine God doth disap- point.
T. Sanders, 1564 (Arber's Eng. Garner, II. 12).

His retiring foe
Shrinks from the wound, and disappoints the blow.
Addison.

They endeavour to disappoint the good works of the most learned and venerable order of men. Steele, Tatler, No. 135.

No prudence of ours could have prevented our late misfortune; but prudence may do much in disappointing its effects.
Goldsmith, Vicar, iii.

disappointed (dis-a-poin'ted), p. a. [Pp. of disappoint, v.] 1. Baffled; balked; thwarted; frustrated: as, a disappointed man; disappointed hopes.—2. Not appointed or prepared; unprepared or ill-prepared. [Rare.]

Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin,
Unhousel'd, disappointed, unanoid'd.
Shak., Hamlet, I. 5.

disappointing (dis-a-poin'ting), p. a. [Ppr. of disappoint, v.] Causing disappointment; not equal to or falling short of one's expectation; unsatisfactory.

But the place (Gorizia) itself is, considering its history,
a little disappointing.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 48.

disappointment (dis-a-point'ment), n. [< dis- appoint + -ment, after F. déception.] 1.
Defeat or failure of expectation, hope, wish, desire, or intention; miscarriage of design or plan: as, he has had many disappointments in life.—2. The state of being disappointed or defeated in the realization of one's expectation or intention in regard to some matter, or the resulting feeling of depression, mortification, or vexation.

If we hope for things of which we have not thoroughly considered the value, our disappointment will be greater than our pleasure in the fruition of them.
Addison, Spectator.

disappreciate (dis-a-pré'shi-ât), v. t.; pret. and
pp. disappreciated, ppr. disappreciating. [< dis- priv. + appreciate. Cf. Sp. Pg. desprecia.]

and pp. disappropriated, ppr. disappropriating.
[< dis-priv. + appropriate, v.] 1. To remove from individual possession or ownership; throw off or aside; get rid of.

How much more law-like were it to assist nature in disappropriating that evil which by continuing proper becomes destructive!
Milton, Tetrachordon.

Specifically—2. To sever or separate, as an appropriation; withdraw from an appropriate use.

The appropriations of the several personages would have been, by the rules of the common law, disappropri- ated.
Blackstone.

3. To deprive of appropriated property, as a church; exclude or debar from possession.

disappropriate (dis-a-prô-pri-ât), a. [< dis- priv. + appropriate, a.] Deprived of appropriation; not possessing appropriated church property. In the Church of England a disappropriate church is one from which the appropriated parsonage, glebe, and tithes are severed.

The appropriation may be severed and the church become disappropriate, two ways.
Blackstone.

disappropriation (dis-a-prô-pri-â-shon), n. [= F. désappropriation = Pg. desapropriacão; as dis-priv. + appropriation.] 1. The act of withdrawing from an appointed use. Specifically—2. The act of alienating church property from the purpose for which it was designed.

disapproval (dis-a-prô-vâl), n. [< dis-priv. + approval.] The act of disapproving; disapprobation; dislike.

There being not a word let fall from them in disapproval of that opinion.
Glanville, Pre-existence of Souls, iv.

=Syn. See disapprobation.

disapprove (dis-a-prôv'), v.; pret. and pp. dis- approved, ppr. disapproving. [= F. désappro- ver = Sp. desaprobar = Pg. desapprovar = It. dis- approvare; as dis-priv. + approve.] 1. Trans.
1. To regard with disfavor; think wrong or reprehensible; censure or condemn in opinion or judgment: now generally followed by of: as, to disapprove of dancing, or of late hours.

I disapprove alike
The host whose sensuality extreme Distresses, and whose negligence offends.
Cowper, Odyssey, xv.

2. To withhold approval from; reject as not approved of; decline to sanction: as, the court disapproved the verdict.

II. Intrans. To express or feel disapproba-tion.

There is no reason to believe that they ever disapprove where the thing objected to is the execution of some order unquestionably proceeding from the Emperor.
Brougham.

Rochester, disapproving and murmuring, consented to serve.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

disapprovingly (dis-a-prô-ving-ly), adv. In a disapproving manner; with disapprobation.

disard, n. Same as dissard.

disarm (dis-arm'), v. [< ME. desarmen, < OF.
desarmer, F. désarmer = Pr. Sp. Pg. desarmer

Nothing disarms censure like self-accusation.
J. T. Frothingham, Coupon Bonds, p. 220.

II. Intrans. To lay down arms; specifically, to reduce armaments to a peace footing; dismiss or disband troops: as, the nations were then disarming.

disarmament (dis-arm'ment), n. [= F. dés- armement = Sp. desarmamiento = Pg. desarma- mento = It. disarmamento, < ML. "disarmamen- tum, < disarmare, disarm: see disarm, and cf. armament.] The act of disarming; the reduction of military and naval forces from a war to a peace footing: as, a general disarmament is much to be desired.

He [Napoleon], in a fit of irresolution, broached in Berlin the question of mutual disarmament.
Lowe, Bismarck, I. 489.

disarmature (dis-arm'mâ-tür), n. [< disarm +
-ature, after armature.] The act of disarming or disabling; the act of divesting one's self or another of any equipment; divestiture. [Rare.]

On the universities which have illegally dropt philosophy and its training from their course of discipline will lie the responsibility of this singular and dangerous dis- armature.
Sir W. Hamilton.

disarmed (dis-arm'd'), p. a. [Pp. of disarm, v.] arrange, disarray; as dis- + arrange.] To put out of order; unsettle or disturb the order or arrangement of; derange.

This circumstance disarranges all our established ideas.
T. Watson.

We could hardly alter one word, or disarrange one member without spoiling it. Few sentences are to be found more finished or more happy. Blair, Rhetoric, xz.

=Syn. To disorder, derange, confuse.
disarrangement (dis-a-rân'ment), n. [< dis- arrange + -ment.] The act of disarranging, or the state of being disarranged.

In his opinion, the very worst part of the example set in the late assumption of citizenship by the army, and the whole of the arrangement or rather disarrangement of their military.
Burns, The Army Estimates.

disarray (dis-a-ré'), v. [< OF. desarreer, des-

Greene, Alphonsus, v.

disbecome (dis-bē-kum'), r. t. [< dis-priv. + become.] To misbecome.

Anything that may disbecome
The place on which you sit.

Maaringer and Field, Fatal Dowry, v. 2.

disbelief (dis-bē-lēf'), n. [< dis-priv. + believe.] 1. Positive unbelief; the conviction that a proposition or statement for which credence is demanded is not true.

Our belief or disbelief of a thing does not alter the nature of the thing. Tillotson.

Did I stand question, and make answer, still
With the same result of smiling disbelief?

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 317.

Atheism is a disbelief in the existence of God—that is, a disbelief in any regularity in the Universe to which a man must conform himself under penalties.

Quoted in Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 608.

2. A negation or denial of the truth of some particular thing. [Rare.]

Nugatory disbeliefs wound off and done with. J. Taylor.

—Syn. 1. Disbelief, Unbelief, incredulity, distrust, skepticism, infidelity. Disbelief is more commonly used to express an active mental opposition which does not imply a blameworthy disregard of evidence. Unbelief may be a simple failure to believe from lack of evidence or knowledge; but its theological use has given it also the force of wilful opposition to the truth.

No sadder proof can be given by a man of his own littleness than a disbelief in great men.

Carlyle, Hero-Worship, I.

A disbelief in ghosts and witches was one of the most prominent characteristics of scepticism in the seventeenth century.

Locky, Rationalism, I. 37.

I obtained mercy because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.

1 Tim. I. 13.

Belief consists in accepting the affirmations of the soul; unbelief, in denying them.

Emerson, Montaigne.

disbelieve (dis-bē-lēv'), v.; pret. and pp. disbelieved, ppr. disbelieving. [< dis-priv. + believe.] 1. trans. To reject the truth or reality of; hold to be untrue or non-existent; refuse to credit.

Such who profess to disbelieve a future state are not always equally satisfied with their own reasonings.

Dr. Atterbury.

I disbelieve that any one who is not himself full of love and tenderness has ever, since the world began, yet transmitted to another soul the truth that God is love.

F. P. Cobbe, Ministry of Religion, p. 257.

II. intrans. Not to believe; to deny the truth of any position; refuse to believe in some proposition or statement; especially, to refuse belief in a divine revelation.

As doubt attacked faith, unbelief has avenged faith by destroying doubt. Men cease to doubt when they disbelieve outright.

Cardinal Manning.

disbeliever (dis-bē-lē-vēr'), n. One who disbelieves; one who refuses belief; one who denies the truth of some proposition or statement; an unbeliever.

An humble soul is frightened into sentiments, because a man of great name pronounces hereby upon the contrary sentiments, and casts the disbeliever out of the Church.

Watts.

—Syn. Unbeliever, Skeptic, etc. See Infidel.

disbench (dis-bench'), r. t. [< dis-priv. + bench.] 1. To drive from, or cause to leave, a bench or seat. [Rare.]

Sir, I hope my words disbench'd you not.

Shak., Cor., II. 2.

2. In Eng. law, to deprive of the status and privileges of a bench.

disbend (dis-bend'), r. t. [< OF. desbender, < ML. disbendare, unbend, loosen; in E. as < dis-priv. + bend<sup>1</sup>. Cf. disband.] To unbend; relax; hence, figuratively, to render unfit for efficient action. [Rare.]

As liberty a courage doth impart,
So bondage doth disband, else break, the heart.

Stirling, Julius Caesar, ch. 2.

disbind (dis-bind'), r. t. [< dis-priv. + bind. Cf. disband and disband.] To unbind; loosen.

Nay, how dare we disbind or loose ourselves from the eye of that way of agonising and honouring God, which the Christian church from her first beginnings durst not do?

J. Mede, Discourses, I. 2.

disblame (dis-blām'), r. t. [< ME. desblamen, < OF. desblasmer, denblamer, excuse, < des-priv. + blamer, blamer, blame; see dis- and blame.] To exonerate from blame.

Disblame me if any word be lame,
For as myn actor sayde, so saye I.

Chaucer, Troilus, II. 17.

disbloom (dis-blōm'), r. t. [< dis-priv. + bloom.] To deprive of bloom or blossoms. [Rare.]

A faint flavour of the gardener hung about them [grave-diggers], but sophisticated and disbloomed.

R. L. Stevenson.

disbodied (dis-bod'id), a. [Pp. of **disbody*, equiv. to disembody.] Disembodied.

They conceive that the disembodied souls shall return from their unactive and silent recess, and be joined again to bodies of purified and duly prepared aye.

Glennie, Pre-existence of Souls, xiv.

disbord (dis-bōrd'), r. t. [< OF. desborder, F. déborder, which, however, has not the exact sense of 'disembark,' but means 'overthrow, go beyond, naut. sheer off, get clear,' < des-priv. + bord, edgo, border, board, etc.] To disembark.

And in the arm'd ship, with a well-wreath'd cord,
They strightly bound me, and did all disbord
To shore to supper.

Chapman, Odyssey, xiv.

disbosom (dis-būz'um), r. t. [< dis-priv. + bosom.] To make known, as a secret matter; unbosom.

Home went Violante and disbosom'd all.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 118.

disbourgeon, r. t. See disburgeon.

disbowl (dis-bou'el), r. t.; pret. and pp. disboweled, disbowelled, ppr. disboweling, disbowelling. [< ME. disbowelen (spelled dysbowaylyn—Prompt. Parv.); < dis-priv. + bowl.] To disembowel: usually in a figurative sense.

A great Oke drie and dead,
Whose foot in ground hath left but feeble holde,
But halfe disbowel'd lies above the ground.

Spenser, Ruins of Rome, st. 28.

Nor the disbowel'd earth explore
In search of the forbidden ore.

Adams, tr. of Horace's Odes, III. 3.

'Twas hell, 'twas mired Minotaur,
A dead disbowel'd mystery.

D. G. Rossetti, The Garden of Nineveh.

disbrain (dis-brān'), r. t. [< dis-priv. + brain.] To deprive of the brain; remove the brain from. [Rare.]

If the cerebrum were removed, then all energy was transposed into reflex movement, and consequently dis-brained and decapitated animals manifested much stronger reflex movements than did such animals as possessed this secondary derivation.

Nature, XXX. 290.

disbranch (dis-brānch'), r. t. [< OF. desbrancher, denbranchir, disbranch, < des-priv. + branche, branch; see dis- and branch.] 1. To cut off or separate the branches of, as a tree; prune. [Rare.]

Such as are newly planted need not be disbranched till the sap begins to stir.

K Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense.

2. To sever or remove, as a branch or an offshoot. [Rare.]

She that herself will aliver and disbranch
From her material sap, perforce must wither,
And come to deadly use.

Shak., Lea, IV. 2.

disbud (dis-bud'), r. t.; pret. and pp. disbudded, ppr. disbudding. [< dis-priv. + bud<sup>1</sup>.] To deprive of buds or shoots; remove the unnecessary buds of, as a tree or vine. This is done for the needs of training, and in order that there may be more space and nourishment for the development of those buds which are allowed to remain.

disburden (dis-bēr'dn), v. [Also disburthen; < dis-priv. + burden<sup>1</sup>, burthen<sup>1</sup>.] I. trans. 1. To remove a burden from; rid of a burden; relieve of anything weighty, oppressive, or annoying; disencumber; unburden; unload.

My meditations . . . will, I hope, be more calm, being thus disburdened.

Sir P. Sidney.

The ship having disburdened her selfe of 70 persons, . . . Captaine Newport with 120 chosen men . . . set forward for the discovery of Moucaen.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 108.

How have thy travels
Disburthen'd thee abroad of discontent?

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, I. 1.

When we have new perception, we shall gladly disburden the memory of its hoarded treasures as old rubbish.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 59.

2. To lay off or aside as oppressive or annoying; get rid of; relieve one's self of.

Disburden all thy cares on me.

Addison.

—Syn. 1. To disencumber, free, lighten, discharge, dis-embarrass.

II. intrans. To ease the mind; be relieved.

+ card. Cf. discard.] I. trans. 1. In card-playing: (a) In some games, to throw aside or reject from the hand, as a card dealt to the player which by the laws of the game is not needed or can be exchanged. (b) In other games, as whist, to throw away on a trick, as a card (not a trump) of a different suit from that led, when one cannot follow suit and cannot or does not wish to trump.

Having sea, king, queen, and knave of a suit noted, you would discard the ace. Pole, Whist, v.

2. To dismiss, as from service or employment; cast off.

They blame the favourites, and think it nothing extraordinary that the queen should . . . resolve to discard them. Swift.

Their [the Hydes'] sole crime was their religion; and for this crime they had been discarded. Macclesley, Hist. Eng., v.

3. To thrust away; reject: as, to discard prejudices.

I am resolv'd: grief, I discard thee now; Anger and fury in thy place must enter. Beau. and Fl. (7), Faithful Friends, III. 2.

Still, though earth and man discard thee, Doth thy Heavenly Father guard thee. Whittier, Mogg Magone, III.

=Syn. 2. To turn away, discharge. II. intrans. In card-playing, to throw cards out of the hand. See I.

In discarding from a suit of which you have full command, it is a convention to throw away the highest. Pole, Whist, iv.

discard (dis-kārd'), n. [< discard, v.] 1. In card-playing: (a) The act of throwing out of the hand such cards as are unnecessary in the game, or of playing, as in whist, a card not a trump of a different suit from that led.

In the modern game, your first discard should be from a weak or short suit. Pole, Whist, II.

(b) The card or cards thrown out of the hand.

The discard must be placed face downwards on the table, apart from the stock and from the adversary's discard. Crawford, Whist.

Disciples of Christ. (a) The twelve men specially called or selected by Jesus Christ to be his immediate associates or followers during the three years of his ministry. (b) A Baptist denomination of Christians founded in the United States by Thomas and Alexander Campbell, father and son (originally Irish Presbyterians), and first organized by the latter as a separate body in western Virginia in 1827. The members of this denomination call themselves Disciples of Christ, and they are also known as Campbellites, or simply Christians, the last of which names is more distinctively appropriated by another denomination. (See Christian, 5.) Their original purpose was to find a basis upon which all Christians could unite, and hence they rejected all formulas or creeds but the Bible itself; but their belief is generally orthodox or evangelical, including the doctrine of the Trinity. In general, the only terms of admission to the denomination are the acceptance of the Bible as a sufficient and infallible rule of faith and practice, and adult baptism by immersion. In church government they are congregational. They have representatives in Great Britain and its colonial possessions, but exist in the greatest numbers in the western and southwestern portions of the United States.—The seventy disciples, in the Mormon Ch., a body of men who rank in the hierarchy next after the twelve apostles.—*Syn. 1. Jer. Taylor.

2. To disturb peace and quietness in; agitate; ruffle, as the temper or mind of.

We are then [in private] placed immediately under the eye of God, which awes us; but under no other eyes, and in the neighbourhood of no other objects, which might divert or discompose us.
Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, l. 2.

I am extremely discomposed when I hear scandal.
Steele, Spectator, No. 248.

Croaker. Don't be discomposed.
Lefty. Zounds! Sir, but I am discomposed, and will be discomposed. To be treated thus!
Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, v.

3. To displace; discard; discharge.

He never put down or discomposed counsellor, or near servant, save only Stanley. Beacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 242.
= SYN. 1. To derange, jumble, confuse. — 2. To disconcert, embarrass, fret, vex, nettles, irritate, annoy, worry.
discomposedness (dis-kom-pō's-ed-nes), n. The state of being discomposed; disquietude.

Believe it, sickness is not the fittest time either to learn virtue or to make our peace with God; it is a time of distemper and discomposedness.

Sir M. Hale, Preparative against Afflictions.

discomposition (dis-kom-pō-sah'on), n. [= F. décomposition = Sp. descomposicion = Pg. descomposiçõ = It. scomposizioni; as discompose + -ition, after composition.] Inconsistency; incongruity.

O perplexed discomposition, O riddling distemper,
O miserable condition of man!

discomposure (dis-kom-pō'shūr), n. [< dis-priv. + composure.] 1. The state of being discomposed; disorder; agitation; disturbance; perturbation; as, discomposure of mind.

His countenance was cheerful, and all the time of his being on the scaffold there appeared in him no fear, disorder, change of countenance, or discomposure.
State Trials, Earl of Holland, an. 1640.

2. Inconsistency; incongruity; disagreement.

How exquisite a symmetry . . . in the Scripture's method, in spite of those seeming discomposures that now puzzle me!
Boyle, Works, II. 275.

discompot, v. t. An obsolete spelling of discount.
Discomyces (dis-kō-mī-as'ēs), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. dianor, a disk, + mykes, pl. mykes, fungus.] A large group of ascomycetous fungi, in which the hymenium is exposed and the fruiting body is cupular, discoid, or club-shaped, and sometimes convoluted. In texture they are fleshy or waxy, and often brilliantly colored. They grow chiefly on the ground and on dead wood, but some are parasitic. Boletus is the largest genus, and includes the cup-shaped species (see cut under cupula). Morelia is the edible morel. Also called Holostictes.

discomyctes (dis-kō-mi-sē'tus), a. [As Discomyctes + -ous.] Producing aecium upon an exposed hymenium; specifically, belonging to the Discomyctes, or resembling them in character: in lichens, same as gymnocarpous.

disconcert (dis-kon-sert'), v. t. [OF. disconcerter, F. déconcerter = Sp. Pg. desconcertar = It. disconcertare, soncertare, disconcert, < L. dis-priv. + concertare, contend, ML. concert: see concert, v.] 1. To throw into disorder or confusion; come in the way of; disarrange; obstruct.

Some unforeseen difficulties constantly occur to disconcert my design. Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, cxi.

Obstinacy takes his sturdy stand,
To disconcert what Policy has plann'd.
Cowper, Expostulation.

Maria Theresa again fled to Hungary, and was again received with an enthusiasm that completely disconcerted her enemies. Locky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iii.

2. To unsettle the mind of; discompose; disturb the self-possession of; confuse.

The slightest remark from a stranger disconcerted her. Macaulay, Madame d'Arbigny.

The embrace disconcerted the daughter-in-law somewhat, as the caresses of old gentlemen anshorn and perfumed with tobacco might well do. Thackeray, Vanity Fair.

—Syn. 2. To ruffle. See list under discompose.

disconcert (dis-kon-sert'), n. [= F. déconcerter = Sp. desconcerto = Pg. desconcerto = It. aconcerto; from the verb.] Disunion; disagreement; disconcertment. [Rare.]

The walkers perforce ceased their evolutions, and there was a brief disconcert of the whole grave company. Poe, Maquie of the Red Death.

disconcertion (dis-kon-sēr'shon), n. [OF. disconcert, v. + -ion.] The act of disconcerting, or the state of being disconcerted; confusion.

If I could entertain a hope of finding refuge for the disconcertion of my mind in the perfect composure of yours. Stowe, Trials, H. Rowan, an. 1794.

disconcertment (dis-kon-sert'ment), n. [= F. déconcerterment; as disconcert, v. + -ment.] The state of being disconcerted or disturbed.

House-hunting, under these circumstances, becomes an office of constant surprise and disconcertment to the stranger. Hovells, Venetian Life, vii.

disconducive (dis-kon-dū'v), a. [OF. dis-priv. + conducive.] Not conducive; disadvantageous; obstructive; impeding. Imp. Dict.

disconformable (dis-kon-fōr'ma-bl), a. [OF. dis-priv. + conformable.] Not conformable.

As long as they are disconformable in religion from vs, they cannot be but half his subjects. Stowe, K. James, an. 1601.

disconformity (dis-kon-fōr'mi-ti), n. [= Sp. desconformidad = Pg. desconformidade; as dis-priv. + conformity.] Want of agreement or conformity; inconsistency.

Causes rooted in immutable nature, utter unfitness, utter disconformity. Milton, Tetrachordon.

discongruity (dis-kon-grū'it-i), n. [OF. dis-priv. + congruity.] Want of congruity; incongruity; disagreement; inconsistency.

That great disproportion betwixt God and man; that much discongruity betwixt him and us. W. Montague, Appeal to Caesar, ii. 6.

disconnect (dis-kō-nekt'), v. t. [OF. dis-priv. + connect.] 1. To sever or interrupt the connection of; break the connection of or between; disunite; disjoin: as, to disconnect a locomotive from a train; to disconnect church and state.

This restriction disconnects bank paper and the precious metals. Wells.

2. To disjoin the parts of; deprive of connection or coherence; separate into parts; disassociate: as, to disconnect an engine by detaching the connecting-rod. [Rare in the more general sense.]

The commonwealth itself would, in a few generations, crumble away, be disconnected into dust and powder of individuality. Burke, Rev. in France.

disconnectedly (dis-kō-nek'ted-li), adv. In a disconnected or incoherent manner.

disconnecter (dis-kō-nek'tér), n. One who or that which disconnects; specifically, some mechanical device for effecting disconnection.

disconnection (dis-kō-nek'shon), n. The act of separating or disuniting, or the state of being disunited; separation; interruption or lack of union.

Nothing was therefore to be left in all the subordinate members but weakness, disconnection, and confusion. Burke, Rev. in France.

disconsecrate (dis-kon-sē-krit'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disconsecrated, ppr. disconsecrating. [OF. dis-priv. + consecrate.] To deprive of sacredness; desecrate. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

disconsent (dis-kon-sent'), v. t. [OF. desconsentir, < des-priv. + consentir, consent: see dis- and consent. Cf. dissent.] To differ; disagree; not to consent; dissent.

A man must immediately love God and his commandments, and therefore disagree and disconsent unto the flesh, and be at hate therewith, and fight against it. Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 142.

If, therefore, the tradition of the Church were now grown so ridiculous and disconsenting from the doctrine of the Apostles, even in those points which were of least moment to men's particular ends, how well may we be assured it was much more degenerated in point of Episcopacy. Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

disconsolacy (dis-kon-sō-lā-si), n. [OF. disconsolatio + -cy.] Disconsolateness.

Fenury, baseness, and disconsolacy. Barrow, Expos. of Creed.

disconsolance, disconsolancy (dis-kon-sō-lans, -lan-si), n. [OF. disconsolatio + -ance, -ancy.] Disconsolateness.

disconsolate (dis-kon-sō-lāt), a. [OF. disconsolat = OF. desconsolado, F. désconsolé = Sp. Pg. desconsoado = It. disconsolato, sconsolato, < ML. disconsolatus, comfortless, < L. dis-priv. + consolatus, pp. of consolari, console: see console.] 1. Destitute of comfort or consolation; sorrowful; hopeless or not expecting comfort; sad; dejected; melancholy.

One morn a Peri at the gate
Of Eden stood disconsolate.
Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

2. Causing or manifesting discomfort; sad or saddening; cheerless; gloomy: as, disconsolate news; a disconsolate look or manner.

The disconsolate darkness of our winter nights. Ray.

—Syn. 1. Inconsolatable, forlorn.

disconsolately (dis-kon-sō-lā-ted), a. [OF. disconsolate + -ly.] Disconsolate.

A disconsolately figure, who sate on the other end of the seat, seem'd no way to enjoy the serenity of the season. Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, ii.

disconsolately (dis-kon-sō-lā-ti), adv. In a disconsolate manner; without comfort.

Upon the ground disconsolately laid,
Like one who felt and wall'd the wrath of fate.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, xix. 70.

disconsolateness (dis-kon-sō-lāt-ness), n. The state of being disconsolate or comfortless.

In his presence there is life and blessedness; in his absence, nothing but dolor, disconsolateness, despair. Sp. Hall, Remains, p. 98.

disconsolation (dis-kon-sō-lā'shon), n. [= Sp. desconsolacion = Pg. desconsoalacio = It. disconsolazione, sconsolazione, < ML. as if **disconsolatio* (n-), < disconsolatus, disconsolate: see disconsolate.] Want of comfort; disconsolateness.

The earth yielded him nothing but matter of disconsolation and heaviness. Sp. Hall, Ziklag Spoiled and Revenged.

discontent (dis-kon-tent'), a. [OF. descontent = It. discontento, contento, adj.; as dis-priv. + content, a.] Uneasy; dissatisfied; discontented.

He's wondrous discontent; he'll speak to no man. Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iv. 2.

discontent (dis-kon-tent'), n. [= It. scontento, n.; as dis-priv. + content, n. Cf. discontent, a.] 1. Want of content; uneasiness or inquietude of mind; dissatisfaction with some present state of things; displeasure.

Now is the winter of our discontent
Made glorious summer by this sun of York.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 1.

From discontent grows treason,
And on the stalk of treason, death.
Lucas, Dominion, ii. 2.

'Tis not my talent to conceal my thoughts,
Or carry smiles and sunshine in my face
When discontent sits heavy at my heart.
Addison, Cato, i. 4.

2. One who is discontented; a malecontent.

Fickle changelings and poor discontents,
Which gape, and rub the elbow, at the news
Of hurlyburly innovation. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 1.

Two other discontents so upbraided More with that doctrine, and stood to maintain it, he impeached a Turry.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 123.

He was a discontent during all Oliver's and Richard's government. The Mystery, etc. (1680), p. 45.

discontenter (dis-kon-tent'), v. t. [OF. descontenter, descontenter, discontent; as dis-priv. + content, v.] To make discontented; deprive of contentment; dissatisfy; displease.

Those that were there thought it not fit
To discontent so ancient a wit.
Suckling, Session of the Poets.

discontentation (dis-kon-ten-tā'shon), n. [OF. discontent + -ation.] Discontent; dissatisfaction.

The election being done, he made countenance of great discontentation thereto. Ackam, The Scholemaster, p. 124.

The coming on of the night and the tediousness of his fruitless labour made him content rather to exercise his discontentation at home than there.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

discontented (dis-kon-ten'ted), p. a. [FP. of discontent, v.] Uneasy in mind; dissatisfied; unquiet.

A diseased body and a discontented mind. Tillotson.

discontentedly (dis-kon-ten'ted-li), adv. In a discontented manner or mood. Sp. Hall.

discontentedness (dis-kon-ten'ted-ness), n. Uneasiness of mind; inquietude; dissatisfaction.

discontentful (dis-kon-ten'tful), a. [OF. discontent + -ful, i.] Full of discontent. Hovells. [Rare.]

discontenting (dis-kon-ten'ting), p. a. [PP. of discontent, v.] 1. Giving uneasiness.

How unpleasant and discontenting the society of body must needs be between those whose minds cannot be sociable! Milton, Divorce.

2. Discontented; feeling discontent.

And (with my best endeavours, in your absence)
Your discontenting, rather strive to qualify
And bring him up to liking. Shak., W. T., iv. 3.

discontentment (dis-kon-ten'tment), n. [OF. descontentement, descontentement = It. discontentamento, scontentamento; as discontent + -ment.] The state of being uneasy in mind; dissatisfaction; inquietude; discontent.

She nothing said, no words of discontentment
Did from her lips arise.
Patient Grisard (Child's Ballads, IV. 213).

The politic and artificial nourishing and entertaining of hopes . . . is one of the best antidotes against the poison of discontentments. Bacon, Seditious and Troubles.

discontiguous (dis-kon-tig'ū-us), a. [OF. dis-priv. + contiguus.] Not contiguous: as, discontiguous lands. Imp. Dict.

discontinuab (dis-kon-tin'ū-a-bl), a. [OF. discontinue + -able.] Capable of being discontinued. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

discontinuance (dis-kon-tin'ū-ans), n. [OF. discontinuance, discontinuance, < discontinuer, discontinue: see discontinue.] 1. The act of discontinuing; cessation; intermission; interruption of continuance.

Let us consider whether our approaches to him are always sweet and refreshing, and we are uneasy and impatient under any long discontinuance of our conversation with him. Sp. Atterbury, Works, II. vi.

2. Want of continued connection or cohesion of parts; solution of continuity; want of union; disruption.

The stillfloods of water, if there be enough to follow, will draw themselves into a small thread, because they will not discontinue; but if there be no remedy, then they cast themselves into round drops, which is the figure that saveth the body most from discontinuance. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

3. In old Eng. law, the effect of the alienation by a tenant in tail of a larger estate than he was entitled to, followed by the feeoffee holding possession after the death of the former. This was said to work a discontinuance of the estate of the heir in tail, because he had no right to enter on the land and turn out the person in possession under deed of feoffment, but had to assert his title by process of law. Sometimes called ouster by discontinuance.

The effect of a feoffment by him [the tenant] . . . was to work a discontinuance: that is, his issue had after his death no right to enter on the land and turn out the intruder, but had to resort to the expensive course of asserting their title by process of law, or, in the technical phrase, they were "put to their action."
F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 78.

Discontinuance of a suit, the termination of a suit by the act of the plaintiff, as by notice in writing, or by neglect to take the proper adjournments to keep it pending. Sometimes loosely used of dismissal against the plaintiff's will. See abandonment of an action, under abandonment.

discontinuation (dis-kon-tin'ū-ā'shon), n. [OF. discontinuacion, discontinuation, F. discontinuacion = Sp. descontinuacion = Pg. descontinuação (n-), < discontinuo, pp. discontinuu, discontinue: see discontinue.] Breach or interruption of continuity; disruption of parts; separation of parts which form a connected series.

Upon any discontinuation of parts, made either by bubbles or by shaking the glass, the whole mercury falls. Newton.

discontinue (dis-kon-tin'ü), v.; pret. and pp. discontinued, ppr. discontinuing. [OF. discontinuer, F. discontinuer = Sp. Pg. descontinuar = It. discontinuare, scontinuar, < ML. discontinuar, discontinue, < L. dis- priv. + continuar, continue: see dis- and continue.] 1. To cease from; cause to cease; put an end to; break off; stop: as, to discontinue a habit or practice; to discontinue a suit at law, or a claim or right; their partnership has been discontinued.

The depredations on our commerce were not to be discontinued. T. Pickering.

2. To interrupt; break the continuity of; intermit.

They modify and discriminate the voice without appearing to discontinue it. Holder, Elements of Speech.

3. To cease to take or receive; abandon; cease to use: as, to discontinue a daily paper.

Taught the Greek tongue, discontinued before in these parts the space of seven hundred years. Daniel, Defence of Rhyme.

II. intrans. 1. To cease; come to a stop or end: as, the uproar discontinued at that moment; the fever has discontinued.—2. To be severed or separated.

And thou, even thyself, shalt discontinue from thine heritage that I gave thee; and I will cause thee to serve thine enemies. Jer. xvii. 4.

3. To lose cohesion of parts; suffer disruption or separation of substance. Discon. [Rare.]

discontinue (dis-kon-tin-ü-ë), n. [discontinue + -ë.] In old law, one whose possession or right to possession of something is discontinued, or liable to be discontinued.

discontinuer (dis-kon-tin-ü-ër), n. One who discontinues a rule or practice. Also discontinuer.

discontinuity (dis-kon-ti-nü-i-ti), n. [= F. discontinuité = Pr. discontinuitat, < ML. discontinuitas (-t-s), < discontinuus, < continuuus: see discontinuuus, continuuus.] 1. The fact or quality of being discontinuous; want of continuity or uninterrupted connection; disunion of parts; want of cohesion. See continuity.

Both may pass for one stone and be polished both together without any blemishing discontinuity of surface. Boyle, Works, III. 640.

The discontinuity of memory between different stages of the hypnotic trance and its continuity between recurrences of the same stage. Mind, XII. 619.

2. In math., that character of a change which consists in a passage from one point, state, or value to another without passing through a continuously infinite series of intermediate points (see infinite); that character of a function which consists in an infinitesimal change of the variables not being everywhere accompanied by an infinitesimal change (including no change) of the function itself. An essential discontinuity is a discontinuity in which the value of the function becomes entirely indeterminate.

discontinuer (dis-kon-tin-ü-ër), n. Same as discontinuer: the form used in law.

discontinuuus (dis-kon-tin-ü-us), a. [= Sp. descontinuo = It. discontinuo, < ML. discontinuuus, not continuous, < L. dis- priv. + continuuus, continuous: see dis- and continuuus.] 1. Broken off; interrupted; lacking continuity.

A path that is zigzag, discontinuuus, and interrupted. De Quincy.

Matter is discontinuuus in the highest degree, for it consists of separate particles or molecules which are mutually non-interpenetrable. A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 226.

2. Breaking continuity; severing the relation of parts; disjunctive.

Then Satan first knew pain,
And writhed him to and fro convulsed; so sore
The grinding sword with discontinuuus wound Pass'd through him. Milton, P. L., vi. 339.

3. In math. See the extract.

The term discontinuuus, as applied to a function of a single variable, has been used in two totally different senses. Sometimes a function is called discontinuuus when its algebraic expression for values of the variable lying between certain limits is different from its algebraic expression for values of the variable lying between other limits. Sometimes a function of  $x$ ,  $f(x)$ , is called continuous when, for all values of  $x$ , the difference between  $f(x)$  and  $f(x + h)$  can be made smaller than any assignable quantity by sufficiently diminishing  $h$ , and in the contrary case discontinuuus. If  $f(x)$  can become infinite for a finite value of  $x$ , it will be convenient to consider it as discontinuuus according to the second definition. Stokes.

discontinuuously (dis-kon-tin-ü-us-li), adv. In a discontinuuus manner; with discontinuity.

The figure-dials must be driven discontinuuously. Sir E. Beckett, Clocks and Watches, p. 144.

disconveniensoet (dis-kon-vë'niensoet), n. [ME. disconveniensoe = OF. desconvenance, F. desconvenance = Pr. desconvenencia, desconvenencia = Sp. Pg. desconvenencia = It. disconvenienza, disconvenienza, sconvenienza, sconvenienza, < LL. disconvenientia, disagreement, < L. disconvenient (-t-s), ppr. of disconvenire, disagree: see disconvenire.] Inconvenience; incongruity; disagreement.

A necessary disconvenience, where anything is allowed to be cause of itself. Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 213.

disconvenient (dis-kon-vë'nient), a. [= F. disconvenient (16th cent.), disconvenant = Pr. desconvenient = Sp. Pg. desconveniente = It. disconveniente, sconveniente, < L. disconvenient (-t-s), ppr. of disconvenire, disagree, < dis- priv. + convenire, agree, be convenient: see dis- and convenire.] Inconvenient; incongruous.

Continual drinking is most convenient to the distemper of an hydrophic body, though most disconvenient to its present welfare. Bp. Reynolds, On the Passions, xl.

Discophora (dis-kof'ô-rô), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of discophorus: see discophorus.] 1. The discoidal hydroids, a subclass of Hydrozoa, comprising most of the organisms known as jelly-fishes, sea-jellies, or sea-nettles.

The latter name is given them from the power they possess, like other hydroids, of clinging by means of their thread-cells. The hydrous consists of a single umbrella-like disk, by the rhythmic contraction of which the creature swims, and from the center of which hangs a single polypite or digestive individual, or, less frequently, several. They are free-swimming oceanic animals, whose body consists of such soft gelatinous substance that a specimen weighing several pounds when alive weighs when dried hardly as many grains. The Discophora include many scaphopods, in the usual sense of that term, and are also called Medusae, Ephyronedus, and Aerapoda. They have been divided into Calycina (lucernarians), Rhizostoma, and Monostoma. The term Discophora is also restricted to the last two of these, excluding the Lucernaria. Thus, by Claus, the Discophora are made a suborder of Scyphomedusae, synonymous with Aerapoda, and characterized as disk-shaped scaphopods with the margin of the disk 8-lobed, at least 8 submarginal sense-organs, as many ocular lobes, and 4 great cavities in the umbrella for the generative organs. In this strict sense the Discophora correspond to the Discomedusae (which see). For several wider and inconsistent uses of the term, see the extract.

The binary division of the Hydrozoa was established by Eschscholtz (1829), whose Discophora phanerocarpae correspond to the Scyphomedusae, whilst his Discophora cryptocarpae represent the Hydromedusae. The terms point to distinctions which are not valid. In 1863 Kolliker used the term Discophora for the Scyphomedusae alone, an illegitimate limitation of the term which was followed by Louis Agassiz in 1860. Nicholson has used the term in a reverse sense for a heterogeneous assemblage of those medusae not classified by Huxley as Lucernaria, nor yet recognized as derived from hydroid trophozoites. This use of the term adds to the existing confusion, and renders its abandonment necessary. . . . The term Discophora is used by Claus for the Discomedusae. Eneye. Brit., XII. 556.

2. An order of suetorial worms, the leeches: so called from their sucking-disks. See Hirudinea.

Discophora (dis-kof'ô-rô), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of discophorus: see discophorus.] Same as Discophora.—Discophora cryptocarpae, a term applied by Eschscholtz to those hydroids now called Hydromedusae (which see).—Discophora phanerocarpae, a term applied by Eschscholtz to those hydroids now called Scyphomedusae (which see).

discophoran (dis-kof'ô-ran), a. and n. [Discophora + -an.] 1. A pertaining to or having the characters of the Discophora.

II. n. One of the Discophora.

discophore (dis-kô-fô-rô), n. One of the Discophora. Huxley.

discophorous (dis-kof'ô-rus), a. [NL. discophorus, < Gr. diskophos, bringing the disk (bearing a disk), < diskos, a disk, < dis- + phos, < phero = E. bear.] 1. Provided with a gelatinous bell or disk, as a discophoran; specifically, of or pertaining to the Discophora (def. 1).—2.

In Annelida, having a sucking-disk, as a leech; specifically, of or pertaining to the Discophora (def. 2).

discoplacenta (dis'kô-plâ-sen'tâ), n.; pl. discoplacenta (-tâ). [NL., < Gr. diskos, a disk, + NL. placenta, q. v.] A discoid placenta. See placenta.

discoplacental (dis'kô-plâ-sen'tal), a. [discoplacentalis, < discoplacenta, q. v.] Having a discoid deciduate placenta: as, a discoplacental order of mammals.

Discoplacentalia (dis'kô-plâ-sen-tâ'li-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of discoplacentalis: see discoplacental.] Those deciduate mammals in which the placenta is discoidal, as contrasted with Zonoplacentalia. The group includes the rodents, some edentates, the insectivores, bats, lemurs, monkeys, and man.

discopodium (dis-kô-pô-di-um), n.; pl. discopodia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. diskos, a quoit, disk, + ποῖς (pois) = E. foot.] In bot., the foot or stalk on which some kinds of disks are elevated.

Discoporella (dis'kô-pô-rel'ä), n. [NL., < Gr. diskos, a disk, + πορος, a passage, pore.] The typical genus of the family Discoporellidae.

Discoporellidae (dis'kô-pô-rel'i-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Discoporella + -idae.] A family of chelostomatous polyzoons, typified by the genus Discoporella. They have the subcolum discoid, sometimes confluent, adnate or stipitate, the cells distinct or closely connate, and the intermediate surface cancellated or porous.

discord (dis'kôrd), n. [ME. discord, descord, < OF. descorde, F. discord = Pr. descort, later discord = Sp. Pg. discordia = It. discordia, acordia, < L. discordia, discord, < discord (discord), disagreeing, at variance, inharmonious, < dis-, apart, + cor (cord) = E. heart. Cf. accord, concord.] 1. Want of concord or harmony between persons or things; disagreement of relations; especially, as applied to persons, difference of opinions; variance; opposition; contention; strife; any disagreement which produces passion, contest, disputes, litigation, or war.

And so trowed the Jewen for to have Pea when Crist was ded; For thei seyed that he made Discord and Strif amonges hem. Maundeville, Travels, p. 11.

All nature is but art, unknown to thee;
All chance, direction which thou canst not see;
All discord, harmony not understood.

Pope, Essay on Man, l. 291.

Peace to arise out of universal discord fomented in all parts of the empire. Burke.

2. In music: (a) The combination of two tones that are inharmonious with each other, or inconclusive in combined effect; a dissonance.

Discord is . . . due partly to beats, partly to difficulty in identifying pitch. A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 422.

(b) The interval between two such tones; any interval not a unison, octave, perfect fifth, perfect fourth, major or minor third, or major or minor sixth. In medieval music all but the first three of the above intervals were at first regarded as discords. (c) Either of the two tones forming such an interval. (d) A chord containing such intervals. See dissonance.

Why rushed the discords in, but that harmony should be prized? Browning, Abt Vogler.

Hence—3. Any confused noise; a mingling or clashing of sounds; a harsh clang or uproar.

Arms on armour clashing bray'd Horrible discord. Milton, P. L., vi. 202.

Apple of discord. See apple.—Syn. 1. Discordance, disension, rupture, clashing, farring.

discord (dis-kôrd'), v. i. [OF. descorder, discorder, F. discorder = Pr. descorder = Sp. Pg. discordar = It. discordare, scordare, < L. discordare, disagree, < discors, disagreeing: see discord, n.] 1. To disagree; jar; clash.—2. To be discordant or dissonant.

Sounds do disturb and alter the one the other, . . . the one jarring and discording with the other, and making a confusion. Bacon.

discordable (dis-kôrd'a-bl), a. [ME., < OF. discordable, discordable, < L. discordabilis, discordant, < discordare, disagree: see discord, v.] Discordant. Gower.

What discordable cause hath to rent, and violated the hynding or the alliance of thynges: that is to say, the continuations of God and of man? Chaucer, Boethius, v.

discordance, discordancy (dis-kôrd'ans, -dân-si), n. [ME. discordance, < OF. discordance, discordance, F. discordance = Sp. Pg. discordancia = It. discordanza, scordanza, < ML. discordantia, < L. discordant (-t-s), ppr., discordant: see discordant.] 1. The state of being discordant; disagreement; opposition; inconsistency.

The discordances of these errors is mistaken for a discord of the truths on which they are severally grounded.

Horley, Works, III. xxix.

The most baneful result of such an institution as that of caste is, that it turns religion . . . into a principle of division and discordancy.

Faiths of the World, p. 27.

24. Discord of sound.

Discordant ever from harmony,
And distoned from melody—
In fables made he discords.

Rom. of the Rose.

discordant (dis-kôr'dant), a. [ME. descordant, < OF. discordant, discordant, F. discordant = Sp. Pg. discordante = It. discordante, scordante, < L. discordant(-e), ppr. of discordare, disagree: see discord, v.] 1. Not harmoniously related or connected; disagreeing; incongruous; contradictory; being at variance; clashing; as, discordant opinions; discordant rules or principles.

But it is greatly discordant
Unto the schools of Athens.

Gower, Conf. Amant, VII.

Discordant opinions are reconciled by being seen to be two extremes of one principle.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 280.

Such discordant effect of incongruous excellence and inharmonious beauty as belongs to the death-scene of the Talbots when matched against the quarrelling scene of Somerset and York.

Swinburne, Shakespeare, p. 24.

Colours which are chromatically closely related to one another, such as green and yellow, are discordant when they are arranged so that there is an abrupt transition from one to the other.

Field, Chromatography, p. 55.

2. Opposite; contrary; not coincident: as, the discordant attractions of comets or of different planets.—3. Inharmonious; dissonant; harsh, grating, or disagreeable to the ear.

War, with discordant Notes and jarring Noise,
The Harmony of Peace destroys.

Compuer, Hymn to Harmony.

Landor was never mastered by his period, though still in harmony with it; in short, he was not a discordant, but an independent, singer.

discordantly (dis-kôr'dant-ly), adv. In a discordant manner.

If they be discordantly tuned, though each of them struck apart would yield a pleasing sound, yet being struck together they make but a harsh and troublesome noise.

Boyle, Works, I. 741.

discordantness (dis-kôr'dant-ness), n. Discordance. [Rare.]

discorded (dis-kôr'ded), a. [< discord + -ed.] At variance; disagreeing.

Discorded friends at'd, men and their wives.

Middleton, Anything for a Quiet Life, v. 2.

discordful (dis-kôr'd-fûl), a. [< discord + -ful, 1.] Quarrelsome; contentious.

But Blandamour, full of vainglorious spirit,
And rather staid by his discordful Dame,
Upon them gladly would have prov'd his might.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. iv. 3.

discordous (dis-kôr'dus), a. [< discord + -ous. Cf. OF. discordieus, discordieus, < L. discordiosus, < discordia, discord.] Discordant; dissonant.

Then crept in pride, and peevish covetise,
And men grew greedy, discordous, and nice.

By. Hall, Satires, III. 1. discorporate (dis-kôr'pô-rât), a. [< dis-priv. + corporate, a.] 1. Divested of the body; disembodied. [Rare.]

Instead of the seven corporate selfish spirits, we have the four and twenty millions of discorporate selfish.

Carlyle, Misc., III. 108.

24. Deprived of corporate privileges.

discorporate (dis-kôr'pô-rât), v. t. To deprive of corporate privileges.

discorrespondent (dis-kôr-es-pôn'dent), a. [< dis-priv. + correspond.] Lacking correspondence or congruity.

It would be discorrespondent in respect of God.

W. Montague, Devouta Essays, II. vii. § 3.

discoctate (dis-kôs'tât), a. [< L. dis-, apart, + coctus, rib: see coctate.] In bot., having radiately divergent ribs: applied to leaves, etc.

Discoctomata (dis-kô-stô-ma-tâ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. discoctos, a disk, + otoma(-s), mouth.] In Seville Kent's classification, one of four classes of Protozoa, containing the sponges and collar-bearing monads, or Spongida and Choanoflagellata.

so called from the characteristic discoidal configuration of the introceptive area: contrasted with Pantostomata, Eutostomata, and Polystomata.

It is divided by this author into two sections: the Discoctomata gymnasoida, which are the ordinary collar-bearing monads or Choanoflagellata of most authors; and the Discoctomata cryptozoica, which are the sponges or Spongida.

The term Discoctomata sarcocrypta is an alternative designation of the latter, perhaps by an oversight.

discoctomatous (dis-kô-stom'a-tus), a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Discoctomata.

discounsel (dis-koun'sel), v. t. [< OF. desconseiller, desconseiller, desconseiller, desconseiller, etc., < des-priv. + conseil, etc., counsel: see dis- and counsel, v.] To dissuade.

By such good means he him discounselled
From prosecuting his revenging rage.

Spenser, F. Q., III. l. 11.

discount (dis-kount or dis-kount'), v. t. [Formerly sometimes discount; < OF. disconter, disconter, later descompter, reckon off, account back, discount, F. décompter = Sp. Pg. descontar = It. scontare (cf. D. disconteren = G. discontiren = Dan. diskontere = Sw. diskontera), < ML. discomputare, deduct, discount, < L. dis-, away, from, + computare, reckon, count: see count, v., compute.] 1. To reckon off or deduct in settlement; make a reduction of: as, to discount 5 per cent. for cash payment of a bill.—2. To leave out of account; disregard.

His application is to be discounted, as here irrelevant.

Sir W. Hamilton.

3. In finance, to purchase, or pay the amount of in cash, less a certain rate per cent., as a promissory note, bill of exchange, etc., to be collected by the discounter or purchaser at maturity: as, to discount a bill or a claim at 7 per cent. Compare negotiate.

Power to discount notes imports power to purchase them.

Pope vs. Capital Bank of Topeka, 20 Kan. 440.

The first rule, . . . to discount only unexceptionable paper.

Walsh.

Hence—4. To make a deduction from; put a reduced estimate or valuation upon; make an allowance for exaggeration or excess in: as, to discount a braggart's story; to discount an improbable piece of news.—5. To reckon or act upon in advance; diminish by anticipation the interest, pleasure, etc., of; take for granted as going to happen: as, to discount one's future prospects; to discount the pleasure of a journey.

Speculation as to the political crisis is almost at an end, and the announcement to be made to-morrow in the House of Commons has been already so fully discounted that it is shorn of much of its interest.

Scotman (newspaper).

6. In billiards, to allow discount to: as, to discount an inferior player. See discount, n., 4.

discount (dis-kount), n. [= OF. descompte, F. décompte = Sp. descuento = Pg. desconto = It. sconto, formerly disconto (< D. G. disconto = Dan. diskonto = Sw. diskont), < ML. discomputus, discount; from the verb: see discount, v.] 1. An allowance or deduction, generally of so much per cent., made for prepayment or for prompt payment of a bill or account; a sum deducted, in consideration of cash payment, from the price of a thing usually sold on credit; any deduction from the customary price, or from a sum due or to be due at a future time.—2. In finance, the rate per cent. deducted from the face value of a promissory note, bill of exchange, etc., when purchasing the privilege of collecting its amount at maturity. Bank discount is simple interest paid in advance, and reckoned, not on the sum advanced in the purchase, but on the amount of the note or bill. This is the method recognized in business and in law. True discount is a technical term for the sum which would, if invested at the same rate, amount to the interest on the face value of the note or bill when due: thus, $5 is the bank discount at the rate of 5 per cent. on a bill drawn at twelve months for $100; while $4.7619 is the true discount, because that sum if invested at 5 per cent. would at the end of a year amount to $5. True discount may be found by multiplying the amount of a bill or note by the rate of discount and dividing by 100 increased by the rate; while bank discount is computed in the same manner as simple interest.

3. The act of discounting: as, a note is lodged in the bank for discount; the banks have suspended discounts.—4. In billiards, an allowance made by a superior to an inferior player of a deduction of one count from his string for every count made by the latter. A double discount deducts two counts for one; three discounts, three; and so on up to the grand discount, which deprives the player who discounts his opponent (gives the odds) of all prior counts whenever the latter makes a successful shot.—At a discount, below par; hence, in low esteem; in disfavor.

Originality, vigour, courage, straightforwardness are excellent things, but they are at a discount in the market.

H. N. Owenham, Short Studies, p. 18.

Discount day, the specified day of the week on which a bank discounts notes or bills.

discountable (dis-kount'â-bl), a. [< discount + -able.] That may be discounted: as, certain forms are necessary to render notes discountable at a bank.

discount-broker (dis-kount-brô'kér), n. One who cashes notes or bills of exchange at a discount, and makes advances on securities.

discountenance (dis-koun'te-nans), v. t.; pret. and pp. discountenanced, pp. discountenancing. [< OF. descontenancer, F. décontenancer, abash, put out of countenance, < des-priv. + contenance, countenance: see dis- and countenance, v.] 1. To put out of countenance; put to shame; abash.

This hath discountenanced our scholar's most richly.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

An infant grace is soon dashed and discountenanced, often running into an inconvenience and the evils of an imprudent conduct.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, v. 8.

The hermit was somewhat discountenanced by this observation.

Scott.

2. To set the countenance against; show disapprobation of; hence, to discourage, check, or restrain: as, to discountenance the use of wine; to discountenance the frivolities of the age.

Unwilling they were to discountenance any man who was willing to serve them.

Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

Be careful to discountenance in children anything that looks like rage and furious anger.

Tillotson, Works, I. 11.

Now the more obvious and modest way of discountenancing evil is by silence, and by separating from it.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 157.

discountenance (dis-koun'te-nans), n. [< OF. descontenance, F. décontenance; from the verb.] Cold treatment; unfavorable aspect; unfriendly regard; disapprobation; whatever tends to check or discourage.

He thought a little discountenance on those persons would suppress that spirit.

Clarendon.

discountenancer (dis-koun'te-nan-sér), n. One who discountenances; one who refuses to countenance, encourage, or support.

Scandals and murmur against the king, and his government; taxing him for a great taxer of his people, and discountenancer of his nobility.

Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

discounter (dis-koun'tér), n. One who discounts; specifically, one who buys mercantile paper at a discount.

In order to gorge the whole gang of usurers, pedlars, and itinerant discounters at the corners of streets, (have they not starved the poor of their Christian socks, and their own brother pastors?)

Burke, To a Member of the National Assembly.

discourage (dis-kur'âj), v.; pret. and pp. discouraged, ppr. discouraging. [< ME. discouragen, < OF. discouragier, discouragier, F. discourager (= It. scoraggiare, scoraggiare), dishearten, < des-priv. + coragier, coragier, encourage: see dis- and courage, r., and cf. encourage.] 1. trans. 1. To deprive of, or cause to lose, courage; dishearten; depress in spirit; deject; dispirit.

Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged.

Col. III. 21.

When we begin to seek God in earnest, we are apt, not only to be humbled (which we ought to be), but to be discouraged at the slowness with which we are able to amend, in spite of all the assistances of God's grace.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 232.

2. To lessen or repress courage for; obstruct by opposition or difficulty; dissuade or hinder from: as, to discourage emigration; ill success discourages effort; low prices discourage industry.

In our return, when I staid some time ashore, the boatmen cut down a tree: some labourers near spoke to them not to do it, and I likewise discouraged it.

Poensky, Description of the East, I. 114.

The apostle . . . discourages two unreasonable a presumption.

Rogers.

If revelation speaks on the subject of the origin of evil, it speaks only to discourage dogmatism and temerity.

Macaulay, Sadler's Ref. Refuted.

II. † intrins. To lose courage.

Because that poor Church should not utterly discourage, in her extreme adversities, the Sonno of God hath taken her to His spouse.

Footnote of John Bale, 1553 (Harl. Misc., VI. 464).

discourage (dis-kur'âj), n. [< discourage, v.] Want of courage, cowardice.

There undoubtedly is grievous discourage and peril of conscience; forasmuch as they omit oftentimes their duties and offices.

Sir T. Roper, The Governour, fol. 202.

discouragement (dis-kur'âj-ment), n. [< OF. discouragement, F. découragement = It. scoraggiamento, scoraggiamento; as discourage + -ment.] 1. The act of discouraging; the act of deterring or dissuading from an undertaking.

Over-great discouragement might make them desperate.

State Trials, H. Garnet, an. 1660.

2. The state of being discouraged; depression of spirit with regard to action or effort.

The Car was walking up and down that private walk of his in the little garden at the back of his quarters, his head drooping on his breast, his shoulders bent, his whole attitude eloquent of discouragement.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 151.

3. That which discourages; that which deters or tends to deter from an undertaking or from a course of conduct.

The books read at schools and colleges are full of inducements to virtue and discouragements from vice. Swift.

The steady course of a virtuous and religious life, . . . resisting all the temptations of the world, overcoming all difficulties, and persevering to the end under all discouragements. Clarke, Works, II. 8.

-Syn. 1. Discouragement. — 2. Dejection, hopelessness. — 3. Hindrance, opposition, obstacle, impediment.

discourager (dis-kur'ā-jēr), n. 1. One who or that which discourages, disheartens, or depresses the courage. — 2. One who discourages, discountenances, or deters: as, a discourager of or from marriage.

Those discouragers and abaters of elevated love.

Dryden, The Assignment, III. 1.

discouraging (dis-kur'ā-jing), p. a. [Ppr. of discourage, v.] Tending to dishearten or to depress the courage; disheartening: as, discouraging prospects.

discouragingly (dis-kur'ā-jing-li), adv. In a discouraging manner.

discourse (dis-kōrs'), n. [ME. discourse = D. G. discursus = Dan. Sw. diskurs, < OF. discursus, F. discours = Sp. Pg. discurso = It. discorso, discourse, < L. discursus, a running to and fro, a running about, a pace, gait, L.L. a discourse, conversation, ML. also reasoning, the reasoning faculty, < discurrere, pp. discursus, run to and fro, run through or over, hasten, L.L. go over a subject, speak at length of, discourse of (> It. discorrere = Sp. discorrir = Pg. discorrer = F. discourir, discours), < dis-, away, in different directions, + currere, run: see current, and cf. cours, concours. Hence discursive, etc.] 1. A running over a subject in speech; hence, a communication of thoughts by words; expression of ideas; mutual intercourse; talk; conversation.

Rich she shall be . . . of good discourse, an excellent musician, and her hair shall be of what colour it please God. Shak., Much Ado, II. 3.

His wisdom was greater, and judgment most acute; of solid discourse, affable, humble, and in nothing affected. Evelyn, Diary (1833), p. 4.

The vanquished party with the victors joined, Nor wanted sweet discourse, the banquet of the mind. Dryden.

You shall have very useful and cheering discourse at several times with two several men, but let all three of you come together, and you shall not have one new and hearty word. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 189.

2. A running over in the mind of premises and deducing of conclusions; the exercise of, or an act of exercising, the logical or reasoning faculty; hence, the power of reasoning from premises; rationality.

Sure, he that made us with such large discourse, Looking before, and after, gave us not That capability and godlike reason To fust in us unused. Shak., Hamlet, IV. 4.

Reason is her (the soul's) being, Discursive or intuitive: discourse Is ofttest yours, the latter most is ours. Milton, P. L., v. 488.

Our modern philosophers have too much exalted the faculties of our souls when they have maintained that by their force mankind has been able to find out that there is one Supreme Agent or Intellectual Being, which we call God; that praise and prayer are his due worship; and the rest of those deductions, which I am confident are the remote effects of revelation, and unattainable by our discourse. Dryden, Religio Laici, Pref.

Discourse indicates the operation of comparison, the running backwards and forwards between the characters and notes of objects; this term may, therefore, be properly applied to the elaborative faculty in general. The terms discourse and discursus are, however, often, nay generally, used for the reasoning process, strictly considered. Sir W. Hamilton.

3. A formal discussion or treatment of a subject; a dissertation, treatise, homily, sermon, or the like: as, the discourse of Plutarch on garrulity, of Cicero on old age; an eloquent discourse. — 4. Debate; contention; strife.

The villain . . . Himself addrest unto this new debate, And with his club him all about so blit, That he which way to turne him scarcely wist. . . . At last the captive, after long discourse, When all his strokes he saw avoyded quite, Resolved in one t' assemble all his force. Spenser, F. Q., VI. viii. 14.

[In this passage the editors usually but erroneously give discourse a literal sense, 'a running about, hence a shifting of ground.']

5. Intercourse; dealing; transaction. Beau. and Fl.

discourse (dis-kōrs'), v.; pret. and pp. discouraged, ppr. discouraging. [discourse, n.] 1. Intrans. 1. To hold discourse; communicate thoughts or ideas orally, especially in a formal manner; treat in a set manner; hold forth; expatiate; converse: as, to discourse on the properties of the circle; the preacher discoursed on the nature and effect of faith.

Tha. How likes she my discourse?

Pro. III. when you talk of war.

Tha. But well, when I discourse of love and peace? Shak., T. G. of V., v. 2.

Nay, good my lord, sit still: I'll promise peace, And fold mine arms up; let but mine eyes discourse. Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, III. 1.

He had always in his house doctors and masters, with whom he discoursed concerning the knowledge and the books he studied. Vechnor, Span. Lit., I. 334.

For the greatness of thy iniquity are thy skirts discovered and thy heels made bare. Jer. xlii. 22.

—Syn. 3. To communicate, impart. — 4. To decry, discern, behold. — 5. Discover, invent, agree in signifying to find out; but we discover what already exists, though to us unknown; we invent what did not before exist: as, to discover the applicability of steam to the purposes of locomotion, and to invent the machinery necessary to use steam for these ends. (See invent.) Some things are of so mixed a character that either word may be applied to them.

A great poet invents nothing, but seems rather to discover the world about him, and his penetrating vision gives to things of daily encounter something of the strangeness of new creation. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 302.

The great jurist is higher than the lawyer; as Watt, who invented the steam-engine, is higher than the journeyman who feeds it fire and pours oil upon its irritated machinery.
Sumner, Orations, I. 187.

II. Intrins. 1. To uncover; unmask one's self.

Pha. Discover quickly.
Md. Why, will you make yourself known, my lord?
Middleton, The Phoenix, II. 2.

2. To explore.

Upon all those relations and inducements, Sir Walter Raleigh, a noble Gentleman, and then in great esteem, undertakes to send to discover to the Southward.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 80.

discoverability (dis-kuv'ér-ə-bil'itē), n. [< discoverable: see -bility.] The quality of being discoverable. Carlyle.

discoverable (dis-kuv'ér-ə-bl), a. [< discover + -able.] Capable of being discovered; that may be brought to light, seen, or exposed to view; that may be found out or made known.

Nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered . . . by the interposition of any clouds or mists. Bentley.

Much truth, discoverable even at the present stage of human improvement, as we have every reason to think, remains undiscovered. Brewster, Orations, I. 276.

discoverer (dis-kuv'ér-ér), n. [< discover + -er.] Of F. découvreur = Sp. descubridor = Pg. descobridor = It. scopritore, discoveritore, scopritore. 1. One who discovers; one who finds out or first comes to the knowledge of something.

Those ways, thro' which the discoverers and searchers of the land had formerly passed.
Raleigh, Hist. World, II. v. § 2.

24. One who uncovers, reveals, or makes known; an informer.

All over Ireland the trade of the Discoverer now rose into prominence. Under pretence of improving the king's revenue, these persons received commissions of inquiry into defective titles, and obtained confiscations and grants at small rents for themselves. Looby, Eng. in 18th Cent., vi.

34. A scout; an explorer.

Send discoverers forth,
To know the numbers of our enemies.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

Mirth, and free mindedness, simplicitie,
 Patience, discreteness, and benigntie.
Dr. H. More, Psychathanasia, III. III. 58.

discrepance (dis-krep'ans or dis'kre-pans), n. [< OF. discrepance = Sp. Pg. discrepancia = It. discrepanza, < L. discrepantia, discordance, dissimilarity, < discrepan(-t)s, ppr. of discrepare: see discrepant.] Same as discrepancy. Sir T. Elyot.

discrepancy (dis-krep'an-si or dis'kre-pān-si), n. [< OF. discrepance = Sp. Pg. discrepancia = It. discrepanza, < L. discrepantia, discordance, dissimilarity, < discrepan(-t)s, ppr. of discrepare: see discrepant.] Difference; disagreement; variance or contrariety, especially of facts or sentiments.

Distinguishing a different discrepancy betwixt wit and wisdom.
Ford, Honour Triumphant, iv.

A negative discrepancy arises where one witness passes over in silence what another witness positively avers. A positive discrepancy arises where one witness explicitly affirms something which another witness explicitly denies.
Sir W. Hamilton.

Such, at last, became the discrepancy between him and his Cabinet, that he removed the chief men from office.
Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, v.

At this discrepancy of judgments — mad,
 The man took on himself the office, judged.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 197.

discrepant (dis-krep'ant or dis'kre-pant), a. and n. [< OF. discrepant = Sp. Pg. It. discrepante, < L. discrepan(-t)s, ppr. of discrepare, differ in sound, differ, disagree, < dis-, apart, + crepare, make a noise, crackle: see crepitate.] 1. a. Different; disagreeing; contrary; at variance.

This time
 Is many ages discrepant from thine;
 This was the season when desert was stoop to.
Middleton and Rowley, World Tost at Tennis.

As our degrees are in order distant,
 So the degrees of our strengths are discrepant.
Heywood.

The Author of our being has implanted in us our discrepant tendencies, for wise purposes, and they are, indeed, a part of the law of life itself.
G. F. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., I.

A cognition which may be widely discrepant from the truth.
Mind, IX. 241.

II. † n. One who disagrees or dissents from another, especially in religious belief; a dissenter.

If you persecute heretics or discrepantes, they unite themselves as to a common defence.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 385.

discrete (dis-kre't'), a. [Same as discreet, but directly < L. discretus, distinguished, separated, pp. of discernere, distinguish, separate: see discern and discreet.] 1. Separate; distinct from others; individual: opposed to concrete. In logic, discrete terms or suppositions are such as refer to single individuals. In music, discrete tones are such as are separated by fixed or obvious stops or intervals of pitch, as those of a pianoforte.

There are two laws discrete,

Not reconciled.—

Law for man, and law for thing.

Emerson, Ode to Channing.

A society, formed of discrete units, and not having had its type fixed by inheritance from countless like societies, is much more plastic [than other social organizations].

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 444.

Its seeming continuity is broken up into discrete molecules, separated from each other as the stars in the Milky Way are separated.

G. H. Lewes, Proba. of Life and Mind, II. 29.

2. Consisting of distinct or individual parts; not continuous. Discrete quantity is quantity composed of distinct units, like rational numbers; a system of quantities capable of being in one-to-one correspondence with the series of positive, integer numbers. Discrete proportion is a proportion in which the ratio of the first term to the second is equal to that of the third to the fourth, not to that of the second to the third.

3. In med., opposed to coherent: as, discrete exanthemata. Dunglison.—4. In bot., not coalescent; distinct.—5. Disjunctive; consisting of parts united by some extrinsic bond of connection. Thus, the notion of "women, sailors, and idiots" is a discrete notion.—6. Discretive; containing exceptions, real or apparent.—Discrete degrees, degrees or states of existence so differentiated from one another that their respective subjects can by no means pass from one to another of them: applied by Swedenborg to the higher or lower levels of spiritual life, here and hereafter, to which it is possible for differently constituted, or in the future life differently developed, individuals to attain.

discretely (dis-kre't'li), adv. In a discrete manner; separately; individually.

We reflect upon the relation of each human atom to each other human atom, and to the great Giver of personalities to these atoms—how each is indissolubly bound to each and to Him, and yet how each is discretely parted and impassably separated from each and from Him.

S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 7.

discreteness (dis-kre't'nes), n. The state of being discrete, separated, or distinct; discontinuity.

On the theory, which he is combating, of absolute discreteness, every line or distance is divisible into an infinite number of parts. J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, I. 126.

The term [infinite], when translated into experience, expresses the fact of continuity of existence underlying all discreteness of quantitative division.

G. H. Lewes, Proba. of Life and Mind, II. vi. § 6.

discretion (dis-kresh'on), n. [ME. discrecion, discrecion, discrecion, < OF. discretion, F. discretion = Pr. discretio = Sp. discrecion = Pg. discreção = It. discrezione, discrezione, < L. discretio (n.), a separation, distinction, discernment, < discernere, pp. discretus, discern: see discern and discreet.] 1. Separation; disjunction.

Wysdomes as forgettyngs of ertelly thynges and thynkyng of heven, with discrecyone of all menes dedys.

Lampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. 8.), p. 12.

To shew their [the Jews'] despatch of the poor Gentiles, and to pride themselves in their prerogative and discretion from them.

J. Mede, Diatribes, p. 191.

2. The quality of being discreet; nice discernment and judgment, directed by circumspection, and primarily regarding one's own conduct; prudence; sagacity; circumspection; wariness; caution.

Thus the assaile Arthur, and nought cowde fynde in hym but high vertu and grete discrecion.

Martin (E. E. T. 8.), I. 106.

Is that your Discretion? trust a Woman with herself?

Congress, Love for Love, III. 2.

The happiness of life depends on our discretion.

Young.

The quality the most necessary for the execution of any useful enterprises is discretion: by which we carry on a safe intercourse with others, give due attention to our own and to their character, weigh each circumstance of the business we undertake, and employ the surest and safest means for the attainment of any end or purpose.

Hume, Prin. of Morals, vi.

3. Liberty or power of acting without other control than one's own judgment; independent determination: as, he is left to his own discretion; it is at your discretion to go or to stay.

You may balance this Matter in your own Discretion.

Congress, Way of the World, v. 6.

The Staff, and all officers about him, have a general discretion to lay on with stick or sword whenever they observe any fellows pillaging.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 308.

4. In law, that part of the judicial power which depends, not upon the application of rules of law or the determination of questions of strict right, but upon personal judgment to be exercised in view of the circumstances of each case, and which therefore is not usually reviewed by an appellate tribunal, unless abused. Thus, the question how many witnesses a party may call to testify to one and the same fact rests in discretion, but the question whether a particular witness is competent does not.—Age of discretion. See age, 3.—Arbitrary discretion, that which is exercised without respect to the sufficiency of legal or equitable reasons.—At discretion. (e) According to one's own judgment.

Where history gives you a good heroic outline for a play, you may fill up with a little love at your own discretion.

Sheridan, The Critic, II. 1.

(b) At the mercy of an antagonist or enemy. Thus, to surrender at discretion is to surrender without terms.

If she stays to receive the attack, she is in danger of being at discretion.

Gentleman Instructed, p. 164.

Judicial discretion, that discretion which the parties have a right to require to be exercised with due reference to sound reason and the usage of the courts.—Years of discretion, majority; full age; hence, the time of life when one should exercise prudence and sober reflection.

If you have occasion to mention me, let it be by Parnassus, for that's the Name I have assum'd ever since I came to Years of Discretion.

Steele, Tender Husband, II. 1.

—By discretion, Prudence, Providence, etc. See wisdom and prudence.

discretionary (dis-kresh'on-əl), a. [< discretion + -al.] Of or pertaining to discretion; discretionary.

What is the security for a judge's just exercise of his discretionary powers?

Horley, Speech, June, 1833.

Henry Warden had, with the animation proper to the enthusiastic reformers of the age, transgressed, in the vehemence of his zeal, the bounds of the discretionary liberty allowed to his sect.

Scott, Monastery, xxxi.

discretionally (dis-kresh'on-əl-i), adv. At discretion; at will; by choice.

If hour may be used discretionally as one or two syllables, power may surely be allowed the same latitude.

Norris, Elem. of Orthoepy, p. 80.

discretionarily (dis-kresh'on-əl-i-ri), adv. At discretion. Imp. Dict.

discretionary (dis-kresh'on-əl-i), a. [= F. discrétionnaire; as discretion + -ary.] Left to discretion; limited or restrained only by discretion or judgment: as, an ambassador invested with discretionary powers (that is, empowered to act according to circumstances).

Wherever a discretionary power is lodged in any set of men over the property of their neighbors, they will abuse it.

A. Hamilton, Continentalist, No. 6.

There is, indeed, no power of the government without restriction; not even that which is called the discretionary power of Congress.

Calhoun, Works, I. 253.

discretive (dis-kresh'iv), a. [= OF. discretif = It. discretivo, < LL. discretivus, serving to distinguish, < L. discretus, pp. of discernere, discern: see discreet and discrete.] 1. Disjunctive; noting separation or opposition: as, a discretive proposition. See below. [Rare.]—2. Separate; distinct. [Rare or obsolete.]

His transcendental deduction of the categories of criticism, neither discretive nor exhaustive. W. Taylor (1798).

Discretive distinction, in logic, a distinction implying opposition as well as difference: as, not a man, but a beast.—Discretive proposition, in logic, a proposition which expresses some distinction, opposition, or variety, by means of but, though, yet, etc.: as, travelers change their climate, but not their temper; Job was patient, though his grief was great.

Discretive propositions are such wherein various and seemingly opposite judgments are made, whose variety or distinction is noted by the particles "but, though, yet," etc.

Watts, Logic, II. v. § 6.

discretively (dis-kresh'iv-i), adv. In a discretive manner; in a distinct and separate manner. Bp. Richardson.

Man alone (of the animal creation) has the inspiration of Deity. This is the august peculiarity which separates him discretively and everlastingly from the animal creation.

G. D. Boardman, Creative Week, p. 159.

discriminate, v. [< L. discrimen, a division, separation: see discriminate.] In swg., a bandage used in bleeding from the frontal vein.

discriminable (dis-krim'i-nə-bl), a. [*< L. as if *discriminabilis*, < discriminare, discriminate: see discriminate.] That may be discriminated. Boileau. [Rare or obsolete.]

(b) A higher tonnage-duty on vessels not owned by citizens of the importing country than on vessels owned wholly or in part by such citizens. Also called discriminatory duty.

discriminatingly (dis-krim'i-nā-ting-li), adv. In a discriminating manner; with judgment or discrimination.

Let my good qualities be spoken of discriminatingly, by all means; but not too discriminatingly.

The Atlantic, LVIII, 357.

discrimination (dis-krim-i-nā-shon), n. [< L. discriminatio, < L. discriminare, pp. discrimina- tus, discriminate: see discriminate.] 1. The act of distinguishing; the act of observing, making, or marking a difference; distinction: as, the discrimination between right and wrong.

The sculptors of the last age, from not attending sufficiently to this discrimination of the different styles of painting, have been led into many errors.

Sir J. Reynolds, Discourses, x.

To blame might be hazardous; for blame demands reasons; but praise enjoys a ready dispensation from all reasons and from all discrimination. De Quincey, Rhetoric. Specifically—2. The power of distinguishing or discriminating; discriminative judgment; penetration: as, a man of discrimination.

Their own desire of glory would so mingle with what they esteemed the glory of God as to baffle their discrimination.

Milton, Latin Christianity, xiv. 8.

Unable to praise or blame with discrimination, the masses tempt their leader to folly by assuring him beforehand of plenary absolution.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII, 154.

3. The state of being discriminated, distinguished, or set apart.

There is a reverence to be showed them on the account of their discrimination from other places, and separation for sacred uses.

Stillingfleet.

4. That which serves to discriminate; a mark of distinction.

Take heed of abetting any factions, or applying any public discriminations in matters of religion.

Ep. Grudrn.

Specifically—5. An invidious distinction.

Reproaches and all sorts of unkind discriminations succeeded.

By. Hackert, Abp. Williams, I, 16.

discriminative (dis-krim'i-nā-tiv), a. [< discriminate + -ive.] 1. That marks distinction; constituting a difference; characteristic: as, the discriminative features of men.

There is a set of special distinctions between special orders of phenomena . . . which in some cases exceed in discriminative accuracy any of the corresponding empirical distinctions which the human mind is able to recognize.

J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I, 23.

2. Making distinctions; discriminating.

Discriminative Providence knew before the nature and course of all things.

Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism.

We have also shown that in the cases of the retina and skin every sensible total may be subdivided by discriminative attention into sensible parts, which are also spaces, and into relations between the parts, these being sensible spaces too.

W. James, Mind, XII, 20.

discriminatively (dis-krim'i-nā-tiv-li), adv. With discrimination or distinction.

But it is far less probable that sensation is thus immediately and discriminatively cognizant of molecular neural processes, than that the inseparable motor impulses which attend every form of external stimulation are the immediate cause or objects of sensation.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 234.

discriminator (dis-krim'i-nā-tor), n. [< L. discriminator, < L. discriminare, pp. discrimina- tus, discriminate: see discriminate.] One who discriminates.

L. Addison, Western Barbary (1671), Pref.

discursive (dis-kēr'siv), a. [= F. discursif = Pr. discursiu = Sp. Pg. It. discorsivo, < ML. "discursivus, < L. discursus, pp. of discurrere, run to and fro, LL. speak at length: see discourse.] Cf. discursive.] 1. Relating to the understanding, or the active faculty of knowing or of forming conclusions; ratiocinative: opposed to intuitive.

Reason receives, and reason is her being,
Discursive or intuitive.

Milton, P. L., v, 488.

These four acts of acquisition, conservation, reproduction, and representation form a class of faculties which we may call the subsidiary, as furnishing the materials to a higher faculty, the function of which is to elaborate these materials. This elaborative or discursive faculty is comparison: for under comparison may be comprised all the acts of synthesis and analysis, generalization and abstraction, judgment and reasoning. Comparison, or the elabo-native or discursive faculty, corresponds to the dianoia of the Greeks, to the Verstand of the Germans. This faculty is thought proper; and logic, as we shall see, is the science conversant about its laws.

Sir W. Hamilton.

2. Passing rapidly from one subject to another; desultory; rambling; digressional.

It is a regular rule, . . . of an extent so considerable and of a character so free and discursive, that we can fairly judge from it the condition of the prose language of the time.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., I, 44.

Heart-affluence in discursive talk
From household fountains never dry.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cix.

3. Passing over an object, as in running the eye over the parts of a large object of vision.

All in Himself as in a glass He sees,
For from Him, by Him, through Him, all things see:
His sight is not discursive, by degrees,
But seeing the whole, each single part doth see.

Sir J. Davies, Noce Totpsem.

Discursive judgment, one that is the result of reasoning; a dianoetic judgment.

discursively (dis-kēr'siv-li), adv. In a discursive manner. (a) Digressively. (b) Argumentatively; by reasoning or argument.

We do discursively and by way of ratiocination deduce one thing from another.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 22.

discursiveness (dis-kēr'siv-nes), n. The quality of being discursive.

Each head is treated sufficiently, while all temptation to discursiveness is stoutly resisted.

The Athenaeum, No. 2141, p. 15.

discursory (dis-kēr'sō-ri), a. [< LL. discursus, discourse (see discourse, n.), + -ory.] Having the nature of discourse or reason; rational; argumentative. [Rare.]

Here shall your Majesty find . . . positive theology with polemical; textual with discursory.

By. Hall, Works, I, Ep. Ded.

discursus (dis-kēr'sus), n. [LL., a conversation, discourse; see discourse, n.] Ratiocination; argumentation; discourse.

discus (dis'kus), n.; pl. disci (-si). [L. (NL., etc.), a discus, the disk of a dial, < Gr. δίσκος, a flatish discus, disk, etc. Hence dish, disk, desk, and disc: see these words.] 1. In classical antiquity, a circular piece of stone or plate of metal, about 12 inches in diameter, pitched from a fixed point to the greatest possible distance, as a gymnastic exercise and as an athletic contest. The throwing of the discus was a favorite exercise in the athletic games of Greece, and was one of the five exercises which constituted the pentathlon. See cut under discobolus.

2. In anat., phys., zool., and bot., a disk of any kind.—3. [cap.] In zool.: (a) A genus of mollusks. (b) A genus of scalefish. Lesson, 1837.

All regard of shame she had discuss.

Spenser, F. Q., III, I, 48.

3. To examine; consider and declare one's opinion concerning; hence, to explain; declare; speak about.

Now have yhe herd
How Crist at his last coming Sai in dome sitte and discuss alle thyng.

Hamptre, Prick of Conscience, I, 6247.

That no brother no sister ne shalle discuss the counsell of this fraternite to no strangeringe.

English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 76.

Discuss the same in French unto him.

Shak., Hen. V., iv, 4.

4. To agitate; debate; argue about; reason upon; sift the considerations for and against.

Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly as when they discuss it freely.

Macaulay, Southey's Colloquies.

a term applied to a disease when no anatomical change can be found in the tissues involved. Thomas, Med. Dict.—Graver's disease. Same as Breider's disease.—Hip-joint disease, caries of the bones forming the hip-joint. Also called morbus coxae.—Hodgkin's disease, pseudo-leucocythemia.—Hydrocephalus, lardaceous, etc., disease. See the adjective.—Plant-disease, an abnormal condition in plants, produced in most cases by insects or parasitic fungi. The principal injuries which they produce are destruction of tissues and nutritive materials, impairment of assimilative power, and distortion.—Pott's disease, caries of the spinal column, producing angular curvature.—Raynaud's disease, a disease characterized by local spasm of the small vessels, more or less completely obstructing the circulation of the part, and often leading to gangrene. The parts affected are symmetrically placed, the tips of the fingers and toes being most apt to be attacked. It belongs especially to middle life, and affects predominantly the female sex. It is not fatal. Also called symmetrical gangrene and local asphyxia.—Stationary diseases, a name given by some authorities to certain diseases which depend upon a particular state of the atmosphere, and prevail in a district for a certain number of years, and then give way to others. Dunlop.—The black disease, the black plague or pestilence, the morbus niger of the Latin writers: same as the black death (which see, under death).—Wool-sorer's disease. Same as malignant anthrax (which see, under anthrax). [For special classes of diseases, see acute, chronic, endemic, enthetic, epidemic, occult, organic, symptomatic, etc.—Syn. 2. Indisposition, infirmity, distemper, Malady, Disease, ailment, illness, complaint. Most of these words are weaker and more general than disease. Indisposition is light and temporary. Infirmity is disabling, often local, and perhaps permanent, and is not always properly a morbid condition: as, the infirmity of deafness; the infirmity of old age. There is a tendency to restrict distemper to animals, but it may still be applied to human beings. It is a morbid state of a part or the whole of the body. Malady is a lingering, deep-seated, unmanageable, painful, or fatal disorder. Disease is a definite morbid condition, commonly of serious character and generally active: as, his disease proved to be typhoid fever. See debility and illness.

The king neither can nor ought to absent himself from his parliament, unless he be really indisposed in health; nor then neither, till twelve of the peers have been with him to inspect his body, and give the parliament an account of his indisposition.

Milton, A Defence of the People of England.

Do not muse at me, my most worthy friends;
I have a strange infirmity, which is nothing
To those that know me. Shak., Macbeth, III. 4.

Of no distemper, of no blast he died,
But fell like autumn fruit that mellowed long.
Dryden and Lee, Edipus, IV. 1.

We must not
So stain our judgment, or corrupt our hope,
To prostitute our past-cure malady
To empirics. Shak., All's Well, II. 1.

The remedy is worse than the disease.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, xvi. 21.

disease (di-zēz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. diseased, ppr. diseasing. [< ME. disezen, < (F. decaiser = Pr. decaiser = It. disgiare, make uneasy; from the noun.) 1. To make uneasy; pain; distress.

The fiend was come a-gain that gretly hem diseased, and with grete payne they pained the groves and com a-gain to the hosts.

Morris (E. E. T. S.), III. 649.

His double burden did him sore disease.

Spenser, F. Q., II. II. 12.

... I must disease you straight, sir.

Middleton, The Witch, IV. 3.

The sweet afflictions that disease me. Carew, Song.

2. To affect with disease; make ill; disorder the body or mind of; used chiefly or only in the passive voice or the past participle.

He was diseased in body and mind. Macaulay.

diseasedness (di-zēz'-ned), n. The state of being diseased; a morbid state; sickness.

This is a restoration to some former state; not that state of indigency and diseasedness.

T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

diseasedful (di-zēz'-fūl), a. [< disease + -ful, 1. 1. Occasioning uneasiness; troublesome.

Where the majesty of the king's house draws recourse and access, it is both disgraced to the king and diseasedful to the people if the ways near abouts be not fair and good. Bacon, Charge upon the Commission for the Verge.

2. Abounding with disease; diseased.

If his body were neglected, it is like that his languishing soul, being disquieted by his diseasedful body, would utterly refuse and loathe all spiritual comforts.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

3. Producing disease: as, a diseasedful climate. Then famine, want, and pain, Sunk to the grave their fainting limbs; but us,
Diseasedful dainties, riot and excess,
And feverish luxury destroy.

T. Warton, The Enthusiast.

diseasedfulness (di-zēz'-fūl-nes), n. The state of being diseasedful.

But as before the consideration of a prison had disgraced all ornaments, so now the same consideration made them attend all diseasedfulness.

Sir F. Sidney, Arcadia, III.

diseasement (di-zēz'-ment), n. [< disease + -ment.] Uneasiness; inconvenience.

For it is not probable that men of great means and plentiful estate will endure the travel, diseasements, and adventures of going thither in person.

Bacon, Plantations in Ireland.

diseasy, a. [< ME. diseey, < disease, uneasiness; see disease, n.] Uneasy.

All the dales of a pore man ben yeve [var. diseasy]. Wyclif, Prov. xv. 15 (Furr.)

disedge (dis-ēj'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disedged, ppr. disedging. [< dis-priv. + edge.] To deprive of an edge; blunt; make dull. [Rare.]

I hold him prudent that in these fastidious times will helpe disedged appetites with convenient condiments.

N. Ward, Simple Coblentz, p. 90.

Served a little to disedge

The sharpness of that pain about her heart.

Tennyson, Geraint.

disedification (dis-ēd'-i-fī-kā'shon), n. [< disedify: see -fy and -ation. Cf. edification.] The act of disedifying; a scandal. [Rare.]

Cardinal Wiseman, in his "Lectures on the Principal Doctrines and Practices of the Catholic Church," delivered in 1836, speaks of "Disedification committed before the church."

N. and G., 7th ser., III. 408.

disedify (dis-ēd'-i-fī), v. t. [< dis-priv. + edify. Cf. OF. deodifier, demolish, destroy, of like formation, in lit. sense.] To fail of edifying; impart false doctrine to. Warburton.

The "Church Times" of March 4, 1887, tells its readers that "such an admission is disedifying to Roman Catholics" (p. 109, col. 2).

N. and G., 7th ser., III. 408.

disembargo (dis-em-bārg'-ō), v. t. [< dis-priv. + embargo.] To release from embargo.

disembark (dis-em-bārk'), v. [Formerly also disimbark; < OF. desembarquer, F. desembarquer (= Sp. Pg. desembarcar = It. disimbarcare), disembark, < des-priv. + imbarcar, embark: see dis- and embark. Cf. disembark, debark.] 1. trans. To debark; remove from on board a ship to the land; unload; put on shore; land: as, the general disembarked the troops at sunrise.

Go to the bay, and disembark my coffers.

Shak., Othello, II. 1.

II. intrans. To land from a ship; go on shore, as at the end of a voyage.

There is a report current to the effect that the next division will not disembark at Malta.

W. H. Russell, The War, I.

disembarkation (dis-em-bārk'-āshon), n. [= Sp. (obs.) desembarcacion = Pg. desembarcação; as disembark + -ation.] The act of disembarking.

disembarrass (dis-em-bar'-as), v. t. [< OF. desembarrasser, F. desembarrasser (= Sp. desembarazar = Pg. desembarazar = It. disimbarazzare), disentangle, < des-priv. + embarrassar, embarrass: see dis- and embarrass. Cf. debarraz.] To free from embarrassment, or from anything that causes embarrassment; clear; extricate: as, her affability completely disembarrassed him; to disembarrass one of a load of care, or of a load of parcels.

We have disembarrassed it of all the intricacy which arose from the different forms of declension, of which the Romans had no fewer than five. Blair, Rhetoric, viii.

Thus disembarrassed of the most formidable means of annoyance, the French monarch went bravely forward with his preparations. Prescott, Ferdinand and Isabella, II. 10.

= Syn. Disentangle, Release, etc. See disengage.

disembarrassment (dis-em-bar'-as-ment), n. The act of extricating, or the state of being extricated, from embarrassment, or from anything that embarrasses.

disembattled (dis-em-bat'-ld), a. [< dis-priv. + embattled.] Deprived of battlements.

It [the wall of Chester] is the gentlest and least offensive of ramparts, and completes its long irregular curve without a frown or menace in all its disembattled stretch.

II. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 9.

disembay (dis-em-bā'), v. t. [< dis-priv. + embay.] To navigate clear out of a bay.

The fair innamorata
Had spy'd the ship, which her heart's treasure bore,
Put off from land: and now quite disembay'd,
Her cables coiled, and her anchors weigh'd, Whilst gentle gales her swelling sails did court.

Sherrburn, Forsaken Lydia.

disembellish (dis-em-bel'-ish), v. t. [Formerly also disembellish; < OF. desembellier, stem of certain parts of disembeller, F. disembeller (cf. Sp. desembellar), disfigure, < des-priv. + embellir, embellish: see dis- and embellish.] To deprive of embellishment. Carlyle.

disembitter (dis-em-bit'-er), v. t. [< dis-priv. + embitter.] To free from bitterness; clear from acrimony; render sweet or pleasant.

Encourage such innocent amusements as may disem-bitter the minds of men.

Addison, Freeholder.

disembodiment (dis-em-bod'-i-ment), n. [< dis-embodiment + -ment.] 1. The act of disembodiment. — 2. The condition of being disembodied.

disembody (dis-em-bod'-i), v. t.; pret. and pp. disembodied, ppr. disembodiment. [< dis-priv. + embody.] 1. To divest of body; free from flesh.

How shall I know thee in the sphere that keeps
The disembodied spirits of the dead?

Bryant.

Mr. Spencer asserts that all forms of religious sentiment spring from the primitive idea of a disembodied double of a dead man.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 808.

2. To discharge from military incorporation; disarm (a military body) and release from service for a specified period: as, the militia was disembodied.

disembogue (dis-em-bōg'), v.; pret. and pp. disembogued, ppr. disemboguing. [Formerly disembogue; < Sp. desembarcar (= Pg. desembarcar), disembogue, < des-priv. + embarcar (= Pg. embarcar), enter by the mouth, or by a narrow passage: see dis- and embogue.] 1. trans. To pour out or discharge at the mouth, as a stream; hence, to vent; cast forth or eject.

Indus, which divideth it in the middle, . . . after nine hundred miles journey, with two navigable mouths disemboguing it self into the Ocean.

Furcas, Pilgrimage, p. 479.

If I get in adoors, not the power o' th' country,
Nor my aunt's curses, shall disembogue me.

Fletcher and Shirley, Night-Walker, v. 1.

Two ships' lading of these precious saints [German reformers] was disembogued in Scotland, where they set up again, and broached anew their pernicious principles.

Dryden, Postscript to Hist. of League.

Rolling down, the steep Timavus raves,
And through nine channels disembogues his waves.

Addison.

II. intrans. 1. To flow out, as at the mouth; become discharged; gain a vent: as, innumerable rivers disembogue into the ocean.

This River, though but small, yet it is big enough for Perseus to enter. It disembogues on the South side, near the middle of the Laguna.

Dampier, Voyages, II. II. 51.

Volcanoes bellow ere they disembogue.

Young.

2. Naut., to pass across, or out of the mouth of, a river, gulf, or bay, as a ship.

My ships ride in the bay,
Ready to disembogue, tackled and mann'd
Even to my wishes.

Beau, and Fl., Knight of Malta, I. 2.

disemboguement (dis-em-bōg'-ment), n. [< disembogue + -ment.] Discharge, as of the water of a river into the ocean or a lake. Smart.

disembosom (dis-em-bōz'-um), v. t. [< dis-priv. + embosom.] To separate from the bosom.

Uninjur'd from our praise can He escape,
Who, disembosom'd from the Father, hews
The heaven of heavens, to kiss the distant earth?

Young, Night Thoughts, ix.

disembowel (dis-em-bou'-el), v. t.; pret. and pp. disemboweled or disembowelled, ppr. disemboweling or disembowelling. [< dis-priv. + embowel.]

1. To deprive of the bowels, or of parts analogous to the bowels; eviscerate: as, to disembowel a carcass; to disembowel a book by tearing out leaves. — 2. To wound in the abdomen in such a manner as to permit the bowels to protrude or escape, as in suicide by hara-kiri. — 3. To take or draw from the bowels, as the web of a spider. [Rare.]

So her disembowell'd web
Arachne in a hall or kitchen spreads,
Obvious to vagrant flies.

J. Phillips, The Splendid Shilling.

disembowelment (dis-em-bou'-el-ment), n. The act or process of disemboweling; evisceration.

One woman will eviscerate about two dozen of herrings in a minute; and when nearly 2000 of them are working . . . the amount of disembowelment may be more exactly imagined than described.

Bwyce, Brit., IX. 250.

disembower (dis-em-bou'-er), v. t. [< dis-priv. + embower.] To remove from or deprive of a bower. Bryant.

disembrangle (dis-em-brang'-gl), v. t. [< dis-priv. + embrangle.] To free from litigation; free from dispute, squabbling, or quarreling.

For God's sake disembrangle these matters, that I may be at ease to mind my own affairs.

Bp. Berkeley, Letters, p. 100.

disembroll (dis-em-broil'), v. t. [< dis-priv. + embroll.] To free from broil or confusion; extricate from confusion or perplexity; disentangle.

It is by this means that Monsieur Vaillant has disembrolled a history that was lost to the world before his time, and out of a short collection of medals has given us a chronicle of the kings of Syria.

Addison, Ancient Medals, I.

disemic (di-sē'mik), a. [< LL. disemius, < Gr. diemios, having two mōs, of doubtful quantity, < di-, two-, + emia, a sign, mark, equivoal, a sign, mark, unit of time, mora.] In anc. pros., containing or equal to two moras, or units of time; equivalent to or constituting two normal shorts or one ordinary long; as, a disemic time, thesis, or arsis. A disemic long is the ordinary long, equal to  $\sim$ , as distinguished from the trisemic, tetrasemic, and pentasemic long, equal to  $\sim\sim$ ,  $\sim\sim\sim$ , and  $\sim\sim\sim\sim$  respectively. A disemic pause (also called a prothesis) is a pause of two times ( $\sim\sim$ ): that is, a space of two shorts essential to the rhythm, but not represented by syllables in the text. A pyrrhic, or foot of two short syllables, is apparently disemic, but according to the best authorities was really trisemic in delivery. See dichronous.

disemploy (dis-em-ploi'), v. t. [< dis- priv. + employ, v.] To throw out of employment; relieve or dismiss from business.

If personal defaultance be thought reasonable to disemploy the whole culling, then neither clergy nor laity should ever serve a prince.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 245.

disemployed (dis-em-ploid'), a. [< dis- priv. + employed.] Unemployed.

The smallest sins and irregularities of our life, which usually creep upon idle, disemployed, and curious persons.

disenchant (dis-en-chānt'), v. t. [< OF. disenchanter, F. désenchanter = Sp. Pg. desencantar = It. disincantare, < L. dis- priv. + incantare, enchant; see dis- and enchant.] To free from enchantment; deliver from the power of charms or spells, or of an enchanter; free from fascination or delusion.

Let your own brain disenchanted you.

Sir P. Sidney.

Haste to thy work; a noble stroke or two Ends all the charms, and disenchants the grove.

Dryden.

No reading or study had contributed to disenchanted the fairy-land around him.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 2.

disenchanted (dis-en-chān'tér), n. [< disenchanted + -er. Cf. F. désenchanteur.] One who or that which disenchants.

disenchantment (dis-en-chānt'ment), n. [< F. désenchantement = Sp. desencantamiento = Pg. desencantamento; as disenchanted + -ment.] The act of disenchanted, or the state of being disenchanted.

All concluded in the promise, which he held for certain, of the disenchantment of Dulcinea.

Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, IV. xviii.

disenchantedness (dis-en-chān'trés), n. [< F. désenchanteur; as disenchanted + -ess.] A female disenchanted.

If he loved his disenchantedness? Ach Gott! His whole heart and soul and life were here.

disencharm (dis-en-chārm'), v. t. [< dis- priv. + "encharm, < en-1 + charm.] To free from a charmed or enchanted condition; disenchanted.

This lasted till he was told of his duty and matter of obedience, and the fear of a sin had disenchanted him.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 703.

disenclose, v. t. See disinclose.

discourage (dis-en-kur'j), v. t.; pret. and pp. discouraged, ppr. discouraging. [< dis- priv. + encourage. Cf. discourager.] To deprive of encouragement; discourage. Mme. D'Arbly.

discouragement (dis-en-kur'j-mēt), n. [< discourage + -ment.] Deprivation or absence of encouragement; discouragement.

On the 24th of July, 1656, our author [South] preached the amaze sermon at St. Mary's, wherein he took occasion to speak of the great discouragement of learning.

Wood, Athens Oxon.

discourage, v. i. [ME. discouracen; as dis- priv. + increase.] To decrease. Chaucer.

discourage, n. [ME. discourace; from the verb.] Diminution. Complaint of the Black Knight.

discumber (dis-en-kum'bér), v. t. [< OF. descombrer, F. descombrer = Pr. descombrar; as dis- priv. + enumber. Cf. discomber.] To free from encumbrance or from whatever tends to encumber, burden, hamper, or impede; disburden: as, the troops discumbered themselves of their baggage; to discumber the mind of its prejudices; to discumber an estate of debt.

Ere dim night had discumbered heaven.

Milton, P. L., v. 700.

I have discumbered myself from rhyme.

Dryden, All for Love, Prof.

The struggling elements of the modern Spanish were discumbering themselves from the forms of the corrupted Latin.

Tschirn, Span. Lit., I. 37.

discumberment (dis-en-kum'bér-mēt), n. [< discumber + -ment.] The act of discumbering, or of freeing from encumbrance: as, the discumberment of an estate from debt by paying off the mortgage.

discumbrance (dis-en-kum'brāns), n. [< discumber + -ance. Cf. encumbrance.] Freedom or deliverance from encumbrance or from whatever tends to encumber or burden: as, the discumbrance of an estate.

There are many who make a figure below what their fortune or merit entitle them to, out of mere choice, and an elegant desire of ease and discumbrance.

Steele, Spectator, No. 264.

disendow (dis-en-dou'), v. t. [< dis- priv. + endow.] To deprive of an endowment or of endowments, as a church or other institution.

Mr. Borthase seems, almost as a matter of course, to assume that the Church is to be presently disendowed upon the scheme of the Liberation Society.

Nineteenth Century, XX. 567.

disendowed (dis-en-doud'), a. [< dis- priv. + endowed.] Not endowed; destitute of means or privileges; in a state of poverty or dependence; hence, proletarian; plebeian.

He implored them to bestow upon the disendowed classes, as they were called, all the benefits of civilization.

Victor Hugo and his Times.

disendowment (dis-en-dou'mēt), n. [< disendow + -ment.] The act of depriving or divesting of an endowment or endowments.

There must, of course, be Disendowment [of the Established (Church) as well as Disestablishment, and the appropriation of the funds will be incomparably the more important process of the two.

R. J. Hinton, Eng. Radical Leaders, p. 25.

disenfranchise (dis-en-frān'chis), v. t.; pret. and pp. disenfranchised, ppr. disenfranchising. [< dis- priv. + enfranchise.] To disenfranchise. Booth. [Rare.]

disenfranchisement (dis-en-frān'chis-mēt), n. [< disenfranchise + -ment.] Disfranchisement. Booth. [Rare.]

disengage (dis-en-gā'j), v.; pret. and pp. disengaged, ppr. disengaging. [< OF. désengager, F. désengager, < des- priv. + engager, engage; see dis- and engage.] I. trans. 1. To set free or release from pledge or engagement; release from promise, engagement, or vow.

I lack you here, for my Lord of Dorset, he might make a cheap bargain with me now, and disengage his honour, which in good faith is a little bound. Donna, Letters, xlii.

2. To release or set free from union, attachment, or connection; detach; loosen or unfasten, and set free; release: as, to disengage a metal from its gangue, or a garment from a clinging blemish; to disengage the mind from study.

Common sense and plain reason, while men are disengaged from acquired opinions, will ever have some general influence upon their minds. Swift, Nobles and Commons, v.

In saying this she disengaged her hand, with a look which I thought a sufficient commentary upon the text.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 20.

She had sunk twice, nor was it in my power to disengage myself in time to bring her relief. Goldsmith, Vicar, iii.

Faraday found the quantity of electricity disengaged by the decomposition of a single grain of water in a voltaic cell to be equal to that liberated in 500,000 discharges of the great Leyden battery of the Royal Institution.

Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 154.

3. In fencing, to carry or pass the point of (the weapon) from one side to the other over or under the adversary's, when the previous relative position or engagement of the blades is to the opponent's advantage. The movement is executed by describing with the point of the weapon a very small circle. Rolando (ed. Forsyth). — Engaging and disengaging machinery. See engage. — Syn. Disengage, Release, Liberate, Disentangle, Disembarrass, Extricate, are here arranged in the order of strength. Disengage suggests that one has been caught in some way and detained; release, that he has been caught and held; liberate, that he has been caught and held securely; disentangle, that he has been well snarled up, and can be set free only with time and painstaking; disembarrass, that he has been kept from progress by something that hampered him or weighed him down; extricate, that he has got into a pitfall or quagmire and needs to be pulled out. Physical suggestions thus qualify the meanings of them all.

II. Intrans. To withdraw; become separated.

Providence gives us notice, by sensible declarations, that we may disengage from the world by degrees.

Jeremy Collier, Thought.

From a friend's grave how soon we disengage! Young.

disentail (dis-en-tail'), v. t. [Also formerly disentail, disentale; < dis-priv. + entail.] 1. To free from entail; break the entail of: as, to disentail an estate.—2. To free from connection; divest.

In all these respects with much more reason undoubtedly ought the censure of the Church be quite devastated and disentail'd of all jurisdiction whatsoever.

Milton, Church Government, II. 3.

disentail (dis-en-tail'), n. [disentail, v.] The act or operation of disentailing or breaking the entail of an estate.

disentangle (dis-en-tang'-gl), v. t.; pret. and pp. disentangled, ppr. disentangling. [dis-priv. + entangle.] 1. To free from entanglement; extricate from a state of involvement, disorder, or confusion: as, to disentangle a skein of thread, a mass of cordage, a set of accounts, or the affairs of a bankrupt firm.

The humble skill
Of Prudence, disentangling good and ill
With patient care.
Wordsworth, Sonnets to Liberty and Order, IV.

2. To loose from that in or by which anything is entangled; extricate from whatever involves, perplexes, embarrasses, or confuses; disengage: as, to disentangle an object from a mass of twisted cord; to disentangle one's self from business, from political affairs, or from the cares and temptations of life.

To disentangle truth from error. D. Stewart.

disentanglement (dis-en-tang'-gl-ment), n. [disentangle + -ment.] The act of disentangling, or the state of being disentangled.

In the disentanglement of this disastrous tale [the Nut-browne Mayde], we are happy to find that all his cruelty was tenderness, and his inconstancy the most invariable truth.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. § 22.

disenter (dis-en-ter'), v. t. See disenter.

disenthrall (dis-en-thrall'), v. t. [Formerly also disinthrall, disinthrall; < dis-priv. + enthrall.] To free from thralldom; liberate from slavery, bondage, or servitude; free or rescue from anything that holds in subjection, whether physical or mental. Also spelled disinthrall.

In straits and in distress
Thou didst me disinthrall. Milton, Pa. iv.

Perhaps his [Cower's] poetry bears truer witness to his habitual feeling, for it is only there that poets disinthrall themselves of their reserve and become fully possessed of their greatest charm—the power of being franker than other men.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 28.

disenthrallment (dis-en-thrall'-ment), n. [disinthrall + -ment.] A freeing, or the state of having been freed, from thralldom; emancipation from slavery or subjection of any kind. Also spelled disinthrallment.

1. Any rimmed and concave or hollow vessel, of earthenware, porcelain, glass, metal, or wood, used to contain food for consumption at meals. Originally applied to very shallow or flat vessels, as plates and platters, the term now usually includes any large open vessel, more or less deep, and with or without a cover, used to contain food or table-drink, such as tea, coffee, or chocolate. The use of the term to include drinking-vessels, as bowls and cups, is less common and seems to be obsolescent, except as such vessels are included in the collective plural dishes. A set of dishes includes all the vessels (except drinking-glasses) requisite for furnishing a table, as platters, plates of various sizes, vessels for vegetables, fruits, preserves, etc., tureens, bowls, and cups and saucers.

temptations. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1855), I. 112.

disincarcerate (dis-in-kār'sp-rāt), v. t.; pret. and
pp. disincarcerated, ppr. disincarcerating. [< dis-priv. + incarcerate.] Cf. Sp. desincarcerar. To liberate from prison; set free from confinement. Harvey.
[Rare.]

disinclination (dis-in-kil-nā'shon), n. [< dis-priv. + inclination.] Want of inclination; want of propensity, desire, or affection (generally implying a positive inclination toward the opposite course or thing); slight dislike or aversion.

Disappointment gave him a disinclination to the fair sex.
Arctostict.

—syn. Indisposition, unwillingness, reluctance, hesitation, repugnance.

disincline (dis-in-kil'n'), v. t.; pret. and pp. dis-inclined, ppr. disinclining. [< dis-priv. + incline.] To make averse or indisposed; make unwilling.

The Provencal poets . . . willingly established themselves . . . under a prince full of knightly accomplishments, and yet not disinclined to the arts of peace.
Zschorn, Span. Lit., I. 277.

Disinclined to help from their own store
The opprobrious wight.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 129.

[This] . . . produced so much effect upon the Committee as to disincline them to report this measure favorably. The American, VII. 292.

disinclose, disenclose (dis-in-kloz', -en-kloz'),
v. t.; pret. and pp. disinclosed, disenclosed, ppr.
disinclosing, disenclosing. [< dis-priv. + inclose, enclose.] To free from inclosure; throw open (what has been inclosed); specifically, to dis-park.

disincorporate (dis-in-kōr-pō-rāt), v. t.; pret.
and pp. disincorporated, ppr. disincorporating. [< dis-priv. + incorporate, v. Cf. F. désincorporer = Sp. Pg. desincorporar.] 1. To deprive of corporate powers or character.—2. To detach or separate from a corporation or society.
disincorporate (dis-in-kōr-pō-rāt), a. [= Sp. Pg. desincorporado; as dis-priv. + incorporate, a.] Disunited from a body or society; unembodied. Bacon.

disincorporation (dis-in-kōr-pō-rā'shon), n. [= F. désincorporation = Sp. desincorporación = Pg. desincorporação; as disincorporate + -ion.] 1. Deprivation of the rights and privileges of a corporation.—2. Detachment or separation from a body, corporation, or society.
disincrustant (dis-in-krus'tant), n. [< dis-priv. + incrust + -ant.] Something which serves to prevent or to remove incrustation.

Zinc as a Disincrustant in Steam Boilers.
Ure, Diet., IV. 1012.

disindividualize (dis-in-di-vid'gū-ā-l-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. disindividualized, ppr. disindividual-izing. [< dis-priv. + individualize.] To deprive of individuality.

The artist who is to produce a work which is to be admired, not by his friends or his contemporaries, but by all men, and which is to be more beautiful to the eye in proportion to its culture, must disindi-vidualize himself, and be a man of no party, and no manner, and no age, but one through whom the soul of all men circulates, as the common air through his lungs.
Emerson, Art.

disinfect (dis-in-fekt'), v. t. [= F. désinfecter = Sp. Pg. desinfectar = It. disinfectare; as dis-priv. + infect.] To cleanse from infection; purify from contagious or infectious matter;
destroy the germs of disease in.

disinfectant (dis-in-fek'tant), a. and n. [= F. désinfectant = Sp. Pg. desinfectante = It. disinfectante; as disinfect + -ant.] I. a. Serving to disinfect; disinfecting.

II. n. An agent used for destroying the contagium or germs of infectious diseases. The disinfectants most used at present are heat, mercuric chlo-ride, sulphur dioxide (formed by burning sulphur), iron pro-toposulphate, zinc chloride, Labarraque's disinfecting solution (fluor-wash chloride), and chlorinated lime, or so-called chloride of lime (calc. chloride). Deodorizers, or substances which destroy smells, are not necessarily disinfectants, and disinfectants do not always have an odor.

The moral atmosphere, too, of this honest, cheerful, simple home scene acted as a moral disinfectant.
T. Whittier, Cecil Dreeme, vi.

disinfection (dis-in-fek'shon), n. [= F. désinfection = Sp. desinfección = Pg. desinfecção; as disinfect + -ion.] Purification from infectious matter; the destruction of the contagium or germs of infectious diseases.

Disinfection consists in the destruction of something infectious, and we fail to see any justification for the popular use of the term which makes it synonymous with de-odorization. Science, VI. 238.

disinfect (dis-in-fek'tor), n. [< disinfect + -or.] One who or that which disinfects; specifically, a device for diffusing a disinfectant in the air to purify it, or destroy contagion.
disinfectant (dis-in-fek'tant), n. [< disinfect + -ant.] After ingenuity, q. v. Disingen-uousness; unfairness; want of candor.

A habit of ill nature and disinfectant necessary to their affairs. Clarendon, Civil War, I. 381.

disingenuous (dis-in-jen'gū-us), a. [< dis-priv. + ingenuous.] Not ingenuous; not open, frank, or candid; uncanonically; insincere; as, a disingenuous person; a disingenuous answer.

Such kinds of disingenuous are very much and disingenuous in Works of Criticism. Addison, Spectator, No. 361.

Persons entirely disingenuous, who really do not believe the opinions they defend. Hume, Prin. of Morals, § 2.

Loveable as he was, it would be disingenuous, as well as idle, to attempt to show that Steele was a prudent man.
A. Deben, Int. to Steele, p. xvi.

disingenuously (dis-in-jen'gū-us-ly), adv. In a disingenuous manner; not openly and candidly.

disingenuousness (dis-in-jen'gū-us-ness), n. The character of being disingenuous; want of candor.

The disingenuousness of embracing a profession to which their own hearts have an inward reluctance.
Government of the Tongue.

disinhabit (dis-in-hab'it), v. t. [< dis-priv. + inhabit. Cf. dishabit.] To deprive of inhabitants.

It was disinhabited size and thirteenth years before Saint Helen's time for lack of water. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 168.

disinherit (dis-in-her'it), n. [See disinherit.]
1. The act of cutting off from hereditary succession; the act of disinheriting.—2.
The state of being disinherited.

The adultery of the woman is worse, as bringing bastardy into the family, and disinheriting or great injuries to the lawful children. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, II. 2.

disinherit (dis-in-her'it), v. t. [*< OF. *disin-herier*; as dis-priv. + inherit. Cf. disinherit.] To deprive of an inheritance or of the right to inherit; prevent, as an heir, from coming into possession of property or right which by law or custom would devolve on him in the course of descent, as by an adverse will or other act of alienation, or by right of conquest.

He was a murderer before a parent; he disinherited all his children before they were born, and made them slaves before they knew the price of liberty.
Bates, Harmony of the Divine Attributes, II.

disinheritance (dis-in-her'it-āns), n. [< OF. disinheritance; as disinherit, v.] The act of disinher-iting, or the state of being disinherited.

Sedition tendeth to the disinheritance of the king.
State Trials, W. Stroud, an. 1630.

disinhume (dis-in-hūm'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disinhumed, ppr. disinhuming. [< dis-priv. + inhume.] To disinter. [Rare.]

Once more the Church is seized with sudden fear,
And at her call is Wolfe's disinhumed.
Wordsworth, Eccles. Sonnets, II. 17.

disintail, disintale, v. t. Obsolete forms of disentail.

disintegrable (dis-in-tē-grā-bl), a. [< disintegrate + -ble.] Capable of being disintegrated.

Argillite-calotte is readily disintegrable by exposure to the atmosphere. Krumm.

disintegrate (dis-in-tē-grāt), v.; pret. and pp. disintegrated, ppr. disintegrating. [< dis-priv. + integrate.] I. trans. To separate into component parts; reduce to fragments; break up or destroy the cohesion of: as, rocks are disintegrated by frost and rain.

The Carolingian empire, first parting into its large divisions, became in course of time further disintegrated by subdivision of these. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 484.

II. intrans. To break up; separate into its component parts.

disintegration (dis-in-tē-grā'shon), n. [< disintegrate + -ation.] The act of separating the component particles of a substance, as distinguished from decomposition or the separation of its elements; destruction of the cohesion of constituent parts; specifically, in geol., the wearing down of rocks, resulting chiefly from the slow action of frosts, rains, and other atmospheric influences.—Disintegration milling.
See milling.

disintegrative (dis-in'tē-grā-tiv), a. [< disintegrate + -ive.] Tending to disintegrate; disintegrating.

The disintegrative process which results in the multiplication of individuals. H. Spencer.

Feudalism itself . . . was by no means purely disintegrative in its tendencies. J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 88.

disintegrator (dis-in'tē-grā-tor), n. [< disintegrate + -or.] One who or that which disintegrates; specifically, a machine for pulverizing, crushing, or breaking up various kinds of materials. A common form used for breaking up ore, rock, artificial manure, oil-cake, etc., and for mixing mortar, etc., as well as for grinding corn, is a mill consisting essentially of a number of beaters projecting from the face of two parallel disks revolving in opposite directions at a high speed.

disintegratory (dis-in'tē-grā-tō-ri), a. [< disintegrate + -ory.] Disintegrating; disintegrative. [Rare.]

Kant has truly said that now criticism has taken its place among the disintegratory agencies, no system can pretend to escape its jurisdiction. G. H. Lewis, Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII, 418.

disinter (dis-in-tēr'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disinterred, ppr. disinterring. [Formerly disenter; < OF. desenterrer, F. desenterrer = Sp. Pg. desenterrar, disinter, < L. dis-priv. + ML. interrare (> OF. enterre, etc.), inter: see inter<sup>1</sup>. 1. To take out of a grave or out of the earth; exhume: as, to disinter a dead body.—2. To take out as if from a grave; bring from obscurity into view.

The philosopher . . . may be concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred, and have brought to light. Addison, Spectator, No. 215.

disinterested, disinterested (dis-in'tēr-est), a. [Also written disinterested; with E. suffix -ed (-P). < OF. desinteressé, F. desinteressé = Sp. Pg. desinteresado = Pg. desinteressado = It. disinteressato, pp. of desinteressare, rid of interest: see disinterest, v.] Disinterested. See disinterested, which has taken the place of disinteressé.

The measures they shall walk by shall be disinterested, and even, and dispassionate, and full of observation. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1838), I, 740.

Because all men are not wise and good and disinterested. Jer. Taylor, Rule of Consolence, II, 5.

disinterestedness (dis-in'tēr-es-ment), n. [< F. desintéressement = Sp. desintereseamiento, < desinteresar, rid of interest: see disinterest, v.] Disinterestedness; impartiality.

He [the Earl of Dorset] has managed some of the greatest charges of the kingdom with known ability, and laid them down with entire disinterestedness. Prior, Postscript to Pref. to Poems.

disinterest (dis-in'tēr-est), n. [= Sp. desinterés = Pg. desinteresse = It. disinteresse, disinterest; as dis-priv. + interest, n. Cf. disinterest, v. 1. What is contrary to interest or advantage; disadvantage; injury.

They ought to separate from her [the Church of Rome], that there be no prejudice done to my true church, nor disinterested to thy kingdom. Dr. H. More, Epistles to the Seven Churches.

3. Indifference to profit; want of regard to private advantage.

disinterest (dis-in'tēr-est), v. t. [For **disinterest*, < OF. desintéresser, F. desintéresser = Sp. desinteresar = Pg. desinteressar = It. disinteressare, rid or discharge of interest, < ML. dis-priv. + interessere, interest: see dis- and interest, v. and n., and cf. disinterest, n.] To rid of interest; disengage from private interest or advantage; destroy the interest of.

A noble courtesy . . . conquers the uncompeivable mind, and disinterests man of himself. Fletcher, Sermon on Luke xiv. 30.

disinterested, a. See disinterested.

disinterested (dis-in'tēr-es-ted), a. [A later form of disinteressé, disinterest, a., as if < disinterest, v. or n., + -ed.] 1. Free from self-interest; unbiased by personal interest or private advantage; acting from unselfish motives.

Every true patriot is disinterested. Whately.

2. Not influenced or dictated by private advantage: as, a disinterested decision.

Friendship is a disinterested commerce between equals. Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, I.

Love of goodness impersonated in God is not a less disinterested, though usually a more fervent, sentiment than love of goodness in the abstract. F. P. Cobbe, Peak in Darien, p. 19.

—Syn. Unbiased, impartial, unbought, incorruptible, unselfish, dispassionate, magnanimous. Disinterested and uninterested are sometimes confounded in speech, though rarely in writing. A disinterested person takes part in or concerns himself about the affairs of others without regard to self-interest, or to any personal benefit to be gained by his action; an uninterested one takes no interest in or is indifferent to the matter under consideration: as, a disinterested witness; an uninterested spectator.

disinterestedly (dis-in'tēr-es-ted-li), adv. In a disinterested manner; unselfishly.

I have long since renounced your world, ye know: Yet weigh the worth of worldly prize foregone, Disinterestedly judge this and that Good ye account good. Browning, Ring and Book, II, 338.

disinterestedness (dis-in'tēr-es-ted-ness), n. The character of being disinterested or unselfish; the fact of having no personal interest in a question or an event; freedom from bias or prejudice on account of private interest; unselfishness; generosity.

Wholly to abstract our views from self undoubtedly requires unparalleled disinterestedness.

Shelley, in Dowden, I, 364.

The conception of pure disinterestedness is presupposed in all our estimates of virtue. Locke, Europ. Moral, I, 72.

disinteresting (dis-in'tēr-es-ting), a. [< dis-priv. + interesting.] Uninteresting. [Rare.]

There is such a dull, heavy succession of long quotations of disinteresting passages that it makes their method quite nauseous. Warburton, to Birch.

He rarely paints a disinteresting subject. The Studio, III, 130.

disinterment (dis-in-tēr-ment), n. [= Sp. desenterramiento = Pg. desenterramento; as disinter + -ment.] The act of disinterring, or taking out of the earth or the grave, literally or figuratively; exhumation.

Our most skilful deliver into dramatic history, amidst his curious names of disinterments, has brought up this proclamation. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I, 373.

disinthal, disinthral (dis-in-thrāl'), v. t. See disenthral.

disinthalment (dis-in-thrāl'-ment), n. See disenthralment.

disintraite (dis-in-trī-tīt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disintraited, ppr. disintricating. [< dis-priv. + intricate.] To free from intricacy; disentangle.

It is therefore necessary to disintraite the question, by relieving it of those two errors, bad in themselves, but worse in the confusion which they occasion. Sir W. Hamilton.

disinure (dis-in-nūr'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disinured, ppr. disinuring. [< dis-priv. + insure.] To deprive of familiarity or custom; render unfamiliar or unaccustomed.

We are hinder'd and disinured by this course of licensing towards the true knowledge of what we seem to know. Milton, Arcopagica, p. 42.

disinvagination (dis-in-vaj-i-nā'shon), n. [< dis-priv. + invagination.] In med., the relief or reduction of an invagination, as of one part of the intestine in another.

disinvalidity (dis-in-vā-lid'-i-ti), n. [< dis-priv. (here intensive) + invalidity.] Invalidity. Again, I do not call those some men's doctrines in this point, private opinions; and so well may I do, in respect of the disinvalidity and disproportion of them. W. Montague, Appeal to Caesar, II.

disinvestiture (dis-in-ves'ti-tūr'), n. [< dis-priv. + investiture.] The act of depriving or the state of being deprived of investiture.

disinvigorate (dis-in-vig'-grāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. disinigorated, ppr. disinigorating. [< dis-priv. + invigorate.] To deprive of vigor; weaken; relax.

This soft, and warm, and disinigorating climate! Sydney Smith, Letters (1844), p. 62.

disinvite (dis-in-vit'), v. t. [= F. désinviter = It. disinviare; as dis-priv. + invite.] To recall an invitation to.

I was, upon his highness's intimation, sent to disinvite them. Sir J. Russell, Foreign Ambassadors, p. 143.

disinvolve (dis-in-volv'), v. t. [= Sp. Pg. desenvolver; as dis-priv. + involve.] To uncover; unfold or unroll; disentangle.

disippus (di-sip'us), n. [NL, irreg. < (V) Gr. δῖς, twice, double-, + ἵππος, horse, as in archippus (in ref. to its imitation of the archippus).] A common and wide-spread species of butterfly, Limenitis disippus, feeding in the caterpillar state on the willow, poplar, and plum, and hibernating in the same state in cases made of rolled leaves. See Limenitis. It occurs in the United States as far north as Maine, in the West Indies, and in northern South America. The adult is supposed to imitate the archippus butterfly (Danaus archippus), the larva of which feeds on asclepiads. See cut in preceding column.

disjunct (dis-jas'kit), a. [*< Sc., said to be a corruption of *disjectus for dejected.*] Jaded; decayed; worn out.

In the morning after the coronation I found myself in a very disjunct state, being both sore in limb and worn out in my mind with the great fatigue I had undergone. Gail, The Steam-Boat, p. 351.

disjuncta membra (dis-jek'th mem'brā), [L.] disjuncta, neut. pl. of disjunctus, scattered; membra, pl. of membrum, member: see disjunction and member.] Scattered members; disjointed portions or parts.

disjunction (dis-jek'shon), n. [*< L. as if *disjunctio(n-), < disjere, disjere, pp. disjunctus, throw apart, scatter, disperse, < dis-, apart, + jacere, throw: see ject, and cf. adject, conject, deject, etc.*] The act of overthrowing or dissipating.

A very striking image of the sudden disjunction of Pharaoh's Host. Horsey, Biblical Criticism, IV, 388.

disjoin (dis-join'), v. [< ME. disjoynen, < OF. desjoindre, F. desjoindre, desjoindre = Fr. desjoindre, dejoiner = It. disgiungere, disgiungere, < L. disjungere or dijungere, pp. disjunctus, separate, < dis-, apart, + jungere, join: see join. 1. To sever the junction or union of; dissolve or break up the connection of; disunite; sunder: as, to disjoin the parts of a machine; they have disjoined their interests.

You shine now in too high a sphere for me; We are planets now disjoined for ever. Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, III, 2.

My Father was appointed Sheriff for Surrey and Sussex before they were disjoined.  Evelyn, Diary, 1694.

2. To prevent from junction or union; keep separate or apart; divide.

The river Nile of Egypt disjoyneth Asia from Africa. Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 108.

Cross disjoined, in her., same as cross double-parted (which see, under cross), n.

II. intrans. To be separated; part.

Two not far disjoining valleys there are that stretch to each other. Sandys, Traveller, p. 17.

disjoint (dis-join'), v. [< dis-priv. + joine, v. 1. trans. 1. To separate or disconnect the joints or joinings of. (a) Anatomically, to disarticulate; dislocate: as, to disjoint an arm or a foot; to disjoint the vertebrae. 2. To break the natural order and relations of; put out of order; derange.

They are so disjointed, and every one commander of himself, to plant what he will. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II, 208.

Were it possible for any power to add to it ever so little, it would at once overstep its bounds; the equilibrium would be disturbed; the framework of affairs would be disjointed. Buckle, Civilization, II, vi.

II. intrans. To fall in pieces.

Let the frame of things disjoin, both the worlds suffer, Ere we will eat our meal in fear. Shak., Macbeth, III, 2. disjoint (dis-join'), a. [< ME. disjoynit < OF. desjoynit, dejoinet, F. disjoint = Sp. disjuncto = It. disgiunto, < L. disjunctus, pp. of disjoindre, disjoint: see disjoin.] Disjointed; disjunct; separated.

Thinking, by our late dear brother's death, Our state to be disjoint and out of frame. Shak., Hamlet, I, 2.

Carrying on a disjoint and privat interest of his own. Milton, Elkonoelastes, iv.

disjoint, n. [ME., < OF. disjointe, desjoynite, separation, division, rupture, < disjoin, pp. of disjoindre, disjoint: see disjoin, a., and disjoin.] A difficult situation; disadvantage.

But sith I see I stonde in this disjoynit, I wol answer you shortly to the joynit. Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, I, 411.

disjointed (dis-join'ted), n. a. [Pp. of disjoint, v. 1. Having the joints or connections separated: as, a disjointed fowl; hence, disconnected; incoherent: as, a disjointed discourse.

The constancy of your wit was not wont to bring forth such disjointed speeches. Sir P. Sidney.

Trust me, I could weep Rather: for I have found in all thy words A strange disjointed arrow. Ben. and Fl., King and No King, II, 1.

Disippus (Limenitis disippus), natural size, showing wings on the left side in their proper position, and on the right side reversed, to show under surface.

A young author is apt to run into a confusion of mixed metaphors, which leave the sense disjointed.

Goldsmith, Metaphors.

2. Out of joint; out of order or sorts; badly joined together.

Melancholy books.

Which make you laugh that any one should weep, In this disjointed life, for one wrong more.

Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, l.

disjointedly (dis-join'ted-li), adv. In a disjointed or disconnected manner.

disjointedness (dis-join'ted-ness), n. The state of being disjointed.

disjointly (dis-join't-li), adv. In a divided state. Sandys.

disjunction (dis-jū-di-kā'shon), n. Same as disjunction.

disjunct (dis-jungkt'), a. [L. disjunctus or disjunctus, pp. of disjungere, disjoin: see disjoin, and disjoin, a.] 1. Disconnected; separated; distinct. Specifically—2. In entom., having the head, thorax, and abdomen separated by a deep incision.—Disjunct modal, in logic, a modal proposition in which the sign of modality separates the dictum into two parts. See conjunct modal, under conjunct.—Disjunct motion. See motion.—Disjunct proposition, a disjunctive proposition.

So when I say, Tomorrow it will rain or it will not rain, this disjunct proposition is necessary, but the necessity lies upon the disjunction of the parts, not upon the parts themselves. Dr. H. More, Immortality of Soul, II. iii. § 12. Disjunct species, in logic, different species considered as coming under one genus.—Disjunct tetrachord. See tetrachord.

disjunction (dis-jungkt'shon), n. [= OF. disjunction, desjoinction, F. disjonction = Sp. disjuncion = It. disgiunzione = L. disgiunctio (=n.) or disjunctio (=n.), separation, < disjungere, pp. disjunctus, disjoin: see disjoin, disjunct.] 1. The act of disjoining, or the state of being disjoined; separation; division; distinction.

The disjunction of the body and the soul. South, Sermons. All thought is a comparison, a recognition of similarity or difference; a conjunction or disjunction . . . of its objects. In Conception—that is, in the forming of concepts (or general notions)—it compares, disjoins, or conjoins attributes. Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, l.

It is presupposed that there are "two kinds" of consciousness, one individual, the other universal. And the fact will be found to be, I imagine, that consciousness is the unity of the individual and the universal; that there is no purely individual or purely universal. So the disjunction made is meaningless. Mind, XLI. 17.

Specifically—2. In logic, the relation between the members of a disjunctive proposition or term.

One side or other of the following disjunction is true. Juley, Evidences, l. 3.

disjunctive (dis-jungkt'iv), a. and n. [= OF. disjunctif, F. disjonctif = Sp. disjuntivo = It. disgiuntivo = L. disgiunctivus or disjunctivus, < L. disjunctus, pp. of disjungere, disjoin: see disjunct, disjoin.] 1. a. 1. Serving or tending to disjoin; separating; dividing; distinguishing: as, a disjunctive conjunction.—2. Incapable of joining or uniting. [Rare.]

Atoms . . . of that disjunctive nature as not to be united in a sufficient number to make a visible mass. Green.

3. Comprising or marked by a disjunction or separation of parts.

Now, in the whole sphere of experience there is a certain unity, corresponding formally to the category of reciprocity, or disjunctive totality. Adamson, Philos. of Kant.

4. In music, pertaining to disjunct tetrachords: as, a disjunctive interval.—Disjunctive conjunction, in gram., a word which joins, or brings into relation with each other, sentences or parts of a sentence disjointed in meaning—that is, which express opposed or contrasted ideas: as, he is good but rough; I neither love him nor fear him.—Disjunctive equation, in math., a relation between two sets of quantities such that each one of either set is equal to some unspecified one of the other set.—Disjunctive judgment or inference. Same as alternative judgment or inference (which see, under alternative).—Disjunctive proposition, a proposition asserting one or other of two separately described states of things to be true: as, either you will give me your money, or I will take your life.—Disjunctive syllogism, in logic, a syllogism in which the major proposition is disjunctive: as, the earth moves in a circle or an ellipse; but it does not move in a circle, therefore it moves in an ellipse.

II. n. 1. In gram., a word that disjoins; a disjunctive conjunction, as or, nor, neither.—2. In logic, a disjunctive proposition.

disjunctively (dis-jungkt'iv-li), adv. In a disjunctive manner; by disjunction.

disjunctor (dis-jungkt'or), n. [NL. disjunctor, < L. disjungere, pp. disjunctus, disjoin: see disjunct, disjoin.] In gun., a device employed to cut simultaneously the electric currents which pass through the wire targets used for obtaining the velocity of a projectile.—Disjunctor readjuster, a small correction applied to the instrumental velocity to obtain the true reading.

disjuncture (dis-jungkt'or), n. [= OF. desjoincture, desjoincture = It. disgiuntura; as disjunct + -ure. Cf. junction.] The act of disjoining, or the state of being disjoined; separation; disjunction.

Brules, disjuncture, or brokenness of bones.

Goodwin, Works, II. iv. 247.

disjune (dis-jōn'), n. [Also dejeune; < OF. desjun, dejeun, breakfast, < dejeuner, dejeuner, breakfast: see dejeuner, déjeuner. Cf. dine.] Breakfast. [Scotch.]

In the morning up soho gait,

And on his heart laid his disjune.

Wye of Auchtermuchty (Child's Ballads, VIII. 118).

Did I not tell you, Mysie, that it was my especial pleasure on this occasion to have everything in the precise order wherein it was upon that famous morning when his most sacred Majesty partook of his disjune at Tilletudlem? Scott, Old Mortality, xl.

disk, disc (disk), n. [L. discus, < Gr. δίσκος, a discus, disk, a dish, trencher: see discus, disk, desk, dais.] 1. Same as discus, 1.

Jago. I pray you call them in.
Oth. I'll do't; but it dislikes me. Shak. Othello, II. 3.
 Would I had broke a joint
 When I devised this, that should so dislike her.
B. Jonson. Every Man out of his Humour, II. 2.
 3. To be displeased with; regard with some aversion or displeasure; disrelish; not to like.
2d Genl. I never heard any soldier dislike it.
Lucio. I believe thee: for I think thou never wast where grace was said. Shak. M. for M., I. 2.
dislike (dis-lik'), n. [dislike, v.] 1. The feeling of being displeased; fixed aversion or distaste; repugnance; the attitude of one's mind toward one who or that which is disagreeable.
 At length a reverend sire among them came,
 And of their doings great dislikes declared,
 And testified against their ways.
Milton. P. L., xl. 720.
 Our likings and dislikes are founded rather upon humour and fancy than upon reason. Sir R. L. Estlin.
 You discover not only your dislikes of another, but of himself. Addison.
 2. Discord; disagreement.

A marmur rose
 That showed dislikes among the Christian poets.
Fairfax.

dislikeful (dis-lik'-ful), a. [dislike + -ful, 1.]
 Full of dislike; disaffected; disagreeable.

I think it best by an union of manners, and conformity of myndes, to bring them to be one people, and to putt away the dislikefull conceit both of the one and the other.
Spenser. State of Ireland.
 Now were it not, sir Scudamour, to you
Dislikefull paine so and a task to take.
Spenser. F. Q., IV. ix. 40.
dislikehood (dis-lik'-li-hood), n. [dis-priv.
 + likelihood.] Want of likelihood; improbability. Scott. [Rare.]
dislikeful (dis-lik'-ful), v. t. [dis-priv. + like.]
 To make unlike; disfigure. [Rare.]
 Muffle your face;
 Dismantle you; and, as you can, dislike
 The truth of your own seeming.
Shak. W. T., iv. 3.
dislikefulness (dis-lik'-ness), n. [dis-priv. + likefulness.] Unlikeness; want of resemblance;
 dissimilitude.
 For that which is not design'd to represent any thing but itself can never be capable of a wrong representation, nor mislead us from the true apprehension of any thing by its dislikefulness to it.
Locke. Human Understanding, III. 4.

dislike (dis-lik'-er), n. One who dislikes or disapproves.
 Among many *dislike*ers of the queen's marriage.

 When she dislives it.
Chapman. Caesar and Pompey, iv. 3.
disload (dis-lod'), v. t. [dis-priv. + load.]
 To relieve of a load; disburden. Carlyle.
dislocate (dis-lok'-at), v. t.; pret. and pp. dis- located, ppr. dislocating. [ML. dislocatus, pp. of dislocare (> It. dislocare, dislogare, slogare = Sp. dislocar = Pg. deslocar = OF. disloquer), displace, < L. dis-priv. + locare, place: see dis- priv. and locate.] 1. To displace; put out of regular place or position; hence, to interrupt the continuity or order of; throw out of order;
 disjoint; derange.
 The archbishop's see, dislocated or out of joint for a time, was by the hands of his holiness set right again.
Fuller.
 Numerous dikes . . . intersect the strata, which have in several places been dislocated with considerable violence, and thrown into highly-inclined positions.
Darwin. Geol. Observations, I. 5.
 Specifically—2. In surg., to put out of joint or out of position, as a limb or an organ; particularly, to displace from the socket of the joint, as a bone; luxate; disjoint, as by violence.—

Dislocated line or strata. In geom., a line or strata that is interrupted, the parts divided not forming a right line.
 —Dislocated margin. In geom., a margin in which the general direction or curve is broken in one place by an abrupt outward or inward flexion.
dislocate (dis-lok'-at), v. t. [ML. dislocatus, pp.: see the verb.] Dislocated. Montgomery.
dislocatedly (dis-lok'-at-ed-ly), adv. In a dislocated or disjointed manner. [Rare.]
dislocation (dis-lok'-a-shun), n. [F. disloca- tion = Sp. dislocacion = Pg. deslocacão, < ML.
**dislocatio* (> dislocare, pp. dislocatus, displace: see dislocate, v.] 1. Displacement; derangement or disorder of parts.
 Neither battle I see, nor arraying, nor king in Israel;
 Only infinite jumble and mess and dislocation.
Clough. Bothe of Tober-na-Vuolich.
 Stopping the purchase and coinage of silver is the first step and the best which the United States can take in doing their great part to repair the monetary dislocation of the world.
Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1890, I. xxxv.
 Specifically—2. In surg.: (a) The displacement or separation of the parts of a joint; the unjointing of a limb; luxation. When dislocation takes place as the result of violence, it is called primitive or ac- cidental; and when it happens as a consequence of disease, which has destroyed the tissues furnishing the joint, it is called consecutive or spontaneous. A simple dislocation is a dislocation unattended by a wound communicating internally with the joint and externally with the air; and a compound dislocation is a dislocation which is attended by such a wound.
 But he (Ravillac) escaped only with this, his body was pild'd between four horses that one might hear his bones crack, and after the dislocation they were set again.
Honell. Letters, I. l. 18.
 (b) Anatomical displacement, as of an organ through disease or violence; malposition.—3.
 In geol., a break in the continuity of strata, usually attended with more or less movement of the rocks on one side or the other, so that, in following any one stratum, it will be found to be above or below the place which it would have occupied had no break or dislocation occurred. See fault.

dislodge (dis-loj'), v.; pret. and pp. dislodged, ppr. dislodging. [OF. desloger, F. déloger (= It.
disloggiare, disloggiare, sloggiare; ML. dislo- giare), < des-priv. + loger, lodge: see lodge.]
 1. trans. To remove or drive from a lodgment or resting-place; displace from a normal or a chosen position or habitation: as, to dislodge a stone from a cliff; to dislodge an army or the occupants of a house.
 The Volcians are dislodged, and Marcius gone.
Shak. Cor., v. 4.
 The shell-fish which are resident in the depths live and die there, and are never dislodged or removed by storms, nor cast upon the shore.
Woodward.
 In single file they move, and stop their breath,
 For fear they should dislodge the o'erhanging snows.
M. Arnold. Sohrab and Rustum.
 On arrival at the ford, I found it in possession of a small body of Arabs, which I had no difficulty in dislodging.
 Quoted in E. Sartorius's In the Soudan, p. 50.

dislodge, v. t. To go from a place of lodgment, abode, or rest.
 They . . . thought it better to dislodge betimes to some place of better advantage & less danger, if any such could be found.
Bradford. Plymouth Plantation, p. 23.
 Though there is no violence used to drive out an inhabitant, yet bad accommodations will make him dislodge.
South. Sermons, IX. 157.

dislodgment (dis-loj'-ment), n. [OF. desloge- ment, F. délogement, < desloger, dislodge: see dislodge.] The act of dislodging, or the state of being dislodged; displacement; forcible removal.

dislogistic, a. An erroneous spelling of dyslo- gistic.
disloign, v. t. [OF. desloignier, desloignier, remove to a distance, < des-, apart, + loignier, remove. Cf. eloign.] To remove to a distance.

Low looking dales, disloigned from common gaze.
Spenser. F. Q., IV. x. 24.
disloyal (dis-loi'-al), a. [OF. desloial, desloial
 (also desleal, desleal, > E. disleal, q. v.), F. déloyal (= Sp. Pg. desleal = It. disleale), disloyal, < des-priv. + loial, loyal, loyal.] 1. Not true to one's allegiance; false to one's obligation of loyalty to a sovereign, state, or government; not loyal.
 William Malmesbury writes, that the King was killed by two Gentlemen of his Bed-chamber, hired by the same disloyal Ricard.
Baker. Chronicles, p. 16.
 Hence—2. Not true to one's obligations or engagements; inconstant in duty or in love;
 faithless; perfidious.

Such things in a false disloyal knave
 Are tricks of custom. Shak. Othello, III. 3.
 The kindest eyes that look on you Without a thought disloyal. Mrs. Browning.

disloyalty (dis-loi'-al-ty), n. [OF. desloialté, desloialté, also deslealté, deslealté, < F. déloyauté (= Sp. deslealtad = Pg. deslealtade = It. dislealtà), disloyalty, < desloial, disloyal:
 see disloyal. Cf. loyalty.] 1. Want of loyalty; specifically, violation of allegiance or duty to a sovereign, state, or government.

He (Suffolk) . . . prayed that if any one would charge him with treason or disloyalty, he would come forth and make a definite accusation. Stubbs. Const. Hist., § 345.
 2. Want of fidelity to one's obligations or engagements; inconstancy in duty or in love; faithlessness; perfidy. Spectator. = Syn. Unfaith-fulness, treachery, perfidy, undutifulness, disaffection.

disluster, disluster (dis-lus'-ter), v. t. [= F. désluster = Sp. Pg. deslustrar = It. slustrare, deprive of luster; as dis-priv. + luster.] To deprive of luster.

And Winter suddenly, like crazy Lear,
 Reels back, and brings the dead May in his arms,
 Her budding breasts and wan dislustered front
 With rusty streaks and drifts of his white beard
 All overblown. Lowell. Under the Willows.

dismal (dis-mád'), a. [dis-, for mis-, + made,
 pp. of make.] Ugly; ill-shaped.
 Whose hideous shapes were like to fennes of hell,
 Some like to houndes, some like to apes, dismayed.
Spenser. F. Q., II. xi. 11.

dismall (dis-mäl'), v. t. [ME. **dismallen*, dismallen, < OF. desmaltier, desmaltier, desmal- ler, desmauler, desmauler, F. démaltier, break the mail of, < des-priv. + maille, mail: see dis- and mail.] To break the mail of; divest of a coat of mail.

Hys helme wasted sore, rent and broken all,
 And hys hauberk dismalled all expresse,
 In many places holes gret and small.
Rom. of Partenay, p. 151.

Their mightie strokes their habergeons dismayed,
 And naked made each others manly spalles.
Spenser. F. Q., II. vi. 23.

dismal (dis-mäl'), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also dismall, dismall, dismold, dysmel, dysmol; < ME. dismal, dismall, dismale, dysmell, dysmell, found first as a noun in the phrase "in the dismal" (see quot. under II. 1), of which the origimeaning is not certain, but which prob. stands for "in the dismal days or time," the word being most frequent in the phrase dismal day or dismal days (see quots. under I.). The originality and meaning of the word have been much debated. It was certainly borrowed, and prob.
 from the OF. From its lack of a recognized literal meaning in E., it must have been borrowed in a figurative sense. "It is just possible that the original sense of in the dismal [days or time] was in titling time; with reference to the cruel extortion practiced by feudal lords, who exacted tithes from their vassals even more peremptorily than tithes were demanded for the church." (Skeat.) This view, which is prob. correct, is based upon what appears to be phoneti-cally the only possible origin of ME. dismal, namely, < OF. **dismal*, F. **dismal* (vernacular form of decimal, F. decimal) = Sp. decimál = Pg. decimál, Sp. Pg. also decimál = E. decimál, < ML. decimális, of a tenth, of tithes, < L. decimus, tenth, ML. fem. decima, a tenth, a tithe, > OF.
dimme, F. dimc, ME. dimme, E. dimme, a tithe, tenth: see decimál and dimc. The notion of official extortion appears further in the related
OF. diamer, diamer, decimate, exact tithes, hence despoil (= Sp. decimar = Pg. decimar, pay tithes, decimate: see decimate), and in evenant, cheat, q. v.] 1. a. Gloomy; dreary; cheerless; melancholy; doleful; dolorous: originally, as an adjective, in the phrase dismal day or dismal days (see etymology), whence it was extended to any visible physical surroundings, or anything perceived or apprehended, tending to de-

And thought that match a fowle disparagement.

Spenser, F. Q., III. viii. 12.

Grace. Now he will marry me to his wife's brother, this wise gentleman that you see; or else I must pay value o' my land.

Quar. 'Bld, is there no device of disparagement, or so? Talk with some crafty fellow, some picklock of the law.

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, III. 1.

2. Injury by union or comparison with something of inferior excellence. Hence—3. The act of undervaluing or lowering the estimation or character of a person or thing; the act of depreciating; detraction.

The attending to his discourses may not be spent in vain talk concerning him or his disparagements, but may be used as a duty and part of religion.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), 1. 757.

He chill'd the popular praises of the King,
With silent smiles of slow disparagement.

Tennyson, Guinevere.

4. Diminution of value or excellence; reproach; disgrace; indignity; dishonor: as, poverty is no disparagement to greatness.

To have commandment over galley-slaves is a disparagement rather than an honor.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, 1. 97.

What disgraces

And low disparagements I had put upon him.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, II. 1.

It can be no disparagement to the most skilful Pilot to have his Vessel towed upon a tempestuous Sea; but to escape with little damage when he sees others sink down and perish shews the great difference which wisdom gives in the success, where the dangers are equal & common.

=Syn. 3. Derogation, depreciation, debasement, degradation.

disparager (dis-par-āj-ēr), n. One who disparages or dishonors; one who belittles, vilifies, or disgraces.

disparagingly (dis-par-āj-ing-lī), adv. In a manner to disparage or dishonor.

Why should he speak so disparagingly of many books and much reading?

Peters, On Job, p. 423.

disparate (dis-pā-rēt), a. and n. [= F. disparate, = It. disparato, sparato, < L. disparatus, pp. of disparare, separate, < dis-priv. + parare, make equal, < par, equal. Cf. compare, and see disparity, dispar.] 1. a. Essentially different; of different species, unlike but not opposed in pairs; also, less properly, utterly unlike; incapable of being compared; having no common genus. St. William Hamilton and his school define disparate predication as those which belong to a common subject or similar subjects.

If the office of an evangelist be higher [than that of a bishop], then as long as they are not disparate, much less destructive of each other, they may have leave to coexist in subordination. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 108.

His [the geometer's] subject matter is perfectly homogeneous, instead of being made up of perfectly disparate orders of existence.

Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, I. § 31.

We can severally form concepts of a word-termination, of a word-root, and of the process of ludding; but the three concepts are wholly disparate, and refuse to unite into a thinkable proposition. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philoa., 1. 65.

II. n. One of two or more things or characters of different species; something that is opposite but not contrary.

Disparates are those of which one is opposed to many after the same manner. So man and horse, and white and blue, are disparates; because man is not only opposed to horse, but also to dog, lion, and other species of beasts; and white not only to blue, but also to red, green, and the other mediate colours, in the same manner—that is, in the same genus of opposition.

Surgaradictus, tr. by a Gentleman.

disparately (dis-pā-rēt-lī), adv. In a disparate manner; unequally.

After the retina is destroyed . . . the eyeballs gradually lose the power of moving together, but move disparately.

disparateness (dis-pā-rēt-nēs), n. The state or quality of being disparate.

There is a disparateness between hearing clicks and counting, as there is between hearing the bell and feeling the index.

Helm, XI. 90.

In 1838, Wheatstone, in his truly classical memoir on binocular vision and the stereoscope, showed that the disparateness of the points on which the two images of an object fall does not . . . affect its seen singleness.

W. James, Mind, XII. 257.

disparclet, v. See dispartle.

dispartition (dis-pā-rish'ŋ), n. [< F. disparition, < *ML. as if *dispartitio(n)-, < disparare*, disappear: see disappear.] Disappearance.

Perhaps, though they knew that to be the prophet's last day, yet they might think his dispartition should be sudden, and insensible; besides, they found how much less affected seecrete in this intended departure.

Sp. Hall, Rapture of Elijah.

disparity (dis-par'ī-tī), n.; pl. disparities (-tīs). [< F. disparité = Sp. disparidad = Pg. disparidade = It. disparità, < ML. disparitatis (-t), inequality, < L. dispar, unequal, < dis-priv. + par, equal. Cf. parity.] 1. The state or character of being disparate. (a) Inequality in degree, age, rank, condition, or excellence: as, disparity in or of years, age, circumstances, or condition.

You not consider, sir,

The great disparity is in their bloods,

Estates, and fortunes.

Fletcher and Rowley, Maid in the Mill, II. 2.

There must needs be a great disparity between the first Christians and those of these latter ages.

By. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xiv.

Though in families the number of males and females differ widely, yet in great collections of human beings the disparity almost disappears.

Maccusley, Sadler's Ref. Refuted.

(b) Dissimilitude; extreme unlikeness; specifically, a degree of unlikeness so great that it renders comparison impossible.

Just such disparity

As is 'twixt air and angels' purity,

'Twixt woman's love and man's will ever be.

Donne, Air and Angels.

2. One of two or more unlike things; a disparate.

There may be no such vast chasm or gulf between disparities as common measures determine.

3. Capable of receiving or being the subject of dispensation; hence, excusable; pardonable.

If straining a point were at all dispensable, it would certainly be so rather to the advance of unity than increase of contradiction.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, vi.

dispensableness (dis-pen'sä-bl-nes), n. The quality of being dispensable; the capability of being dispensed or dispensed with. Hammond.

dispensary (dis-pen'sä-ri), n.; pl. dispensaries (-rî). [= F. dispensaire, a dispensary (cf. OF. dispensaire, expense), < ML. dispensarius, adj. (as a noun, a steward, spencer: see dispenser), < dispensa, provisions, a buttery, larder, spence:
see spence, and dispend, dispense.] 1. A room or shop in which medicines are dispensed or served out: as, a hospital dispensary.

The dispensary, being an apartment in the college, set up for the relief of the sick poor.

Garth, Dispensary, Pref.

2. A public institution, primarily intended for the poor, where medical advice is given and medicines are furnished free, or sometimes for a small charge to those who can afford it.

dispensation (dis-pen-sä'shön), n. [= D. dispen-satie = G. Dan. Sw. dispensation, < OF. despen-sation, F. dispensation = Sp. dispensación = Pg. dispensação = It. dispensazione, < L. dispen-satio(-n), management, charge, direction, < dispensare, pp. dispensatus, manage, regulate, distribute, dispense; see dispense, v.] 1. The act of dispensing or dealing out; distribution:
as, the dispensation of royal favors; the dispensation of good and evil by Divine Providence.

A dispensation of water . . . indifferently to all parts of the earth.

Woodward, Essay towards a Nat. Hist. of the Earth.

2. A particular distribution of blessing or affliction dispensed by God to a person, family, community, or nation, in the course of his dealings with his creatures; that which is dispensed or dealt out by God: as, a sad dispensation; a merciful dispensation.

Neither are God's methods or intentions different in his dispensations to each private man.

Anon.

The kind and chief design of God, in all his severest dispensations, is to melt and soften our hearts to such degrees as he finds necessary in order to the good purposes of his grace.

Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, I. xvi.

3. In theol.: (a) The method or scheme by which God has at different times developed his purposes, and revealed himself to man; or the body of privileges bestowed, and duties and responsibilities enjoined, in connection with that scheme or method of revelation: as, the old or Jewish dispensation; the new or Gospel dispensation. See grace. (b) A period marked by a particular development of the divine purpose and revelation: as, the patriarchal dispensation (lasting from Adam to Moses); the Mosaic dispensation (from Moses to Christ); the Christian dispensation.

There is, perhaps, no part of divinity attended with so much intricacy, and wherein orthodox divines so much differ, as the stating the precise agreement and difference between the two dispensations of Moses and of Christ.

Edwards, Works, I. 100.

Personal religion is the same at all times; "the just"
in every dispensation "shall live by faith."

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 247.

4. Management; stewardship; an act or action as manager or steward.

God . . . hath seen so much amiss in my dispensations (and even in this affair) as calls me to be humble.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 270.

5. A relaxation of the law in some particular case; specifically, a license granted (as by the pope or a bishop) relieving or exempting a person in certain circumstances from the action, obligations, or penalties of some law or regulation. The ecclesiastical laws of the Roman Catholic Church give to the pope the power of granting dispensations in certain cases, and of deputed this power to bishops and others. In universities a dispensation is a permission to omit some exercise.

The Jews in general drink no Wine without a Dispensation. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 14.

Yet appeals did not cease, and the custom of seeking dispensations, faculties, and privileges in matrimonial and clerical causes increased. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 403.

The necessity of dispensation arises from the fact that a law which is made for the general good may not be beneficial in this or that special case, and therefore may be rightly relaxed with respect to an individual, while it continues to bind the community. Rom. Cath. Dict.

dispensation (dis-pen-sā-shon), a. [< dispensation + -al.] Of or pertaining to a dispensation.

The limits of certain dispensational periods were revealed in Scripture. Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 237.

dispensative (dis-pen-sā-tiv), a. [< OF. dispensatif, F. dispensatif = Sp. Pg. It. dispensativo, < ML. dispensativus, < L. dispensatus, pp. of dispensare, dispense: see dispense, v.] 1. Pertaining to dispensation or the granting of dispensations: as, dispensative power.—2. Dispensable; capable of being dispensed with.

All poyntes that be dispensative. Rode Me and Be not Wrothe (ed. Arber), p. 55.

dispensatively (dis-pen-sā-tiv-ly), adv. By dispensation.

I can now hold my place canonically, which I held before but dispensatively. Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie, p. 228.

dispensator (dis-pen-sā-tor), n. [= F. dispensateur = Fr. Sp. Pg. dispensador = It. dispensatore, dispensatore, < L. dispensator, < dispensare, pp. dispensatus, dispense: see dispense, v.] A dispenser.

The Holy Spirit is the great dispensator of all such graces the family needs.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 276.

dispensatorily (dis-pen-sā-tō-ri-ly), adv. By dispensation; dispensatively. Goodwin.

dispensatory (dis-pen-sā-tō-ri), a. and n. [= OF. dispensatoire = Pg. It. dispensatorio, < LL. dispensatorius, relating to dispensing or managing (as a noun, in neut., ML. dispensatorium, a distributing pipe for water, NL. a dispensatory, < L. dispensator, one who dispenses: see dispenser, v.] 1. a. Relating to dispensing; having the power to dispense, or grant dispensations.

II. n.; pl. dispensatories (-riz). A book containing an account of the substances used as medicines, and of their composition, uses, and action; properly, a commentary upon the pharmacopoeia.

The description of the whole ointment is to be found in the chymicall dispensatory of Crolius.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 987.

I confess, I have not without wonder, and something of indignation, seen, even in the public dispensatories, I know not how many things ordered to be distilled with others in balneo.

Boyle, Works, II. 128.

dispensatress (dis-pen-sā-tres), n. [< dispensator + -ess = F. It. dispensatrice.] A female dispenser.

dispense (dis-pens'), v.; pret. and pp. dispensed, ppr. dispensing. [Formerly also dispence; < ME. dispensen = D. dispenseren = G. dispensieren = Dan. dispensere = Sw. dispensera, < OF. doispencer, dispenser, F. dispenser = Pr. Sp. Pg. dispensar = It. dispensare, spensare, < L. dispensare, weigh out, pay out, distribute, regulate, manage, control, dispense, freq. of dispensare, pp. dispensus, weigh out, ML. expend: see expend.] I. trans. 1. To deal or divide out; give forth diffusively, or in some general way; practise distribution of: as, the sun dispenses heat and light; to dispense charity, medicines, etc.

Abundant wyne the north wynde wol dispense To yvnes sette agayne his influence.

Palsgrave, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 7.

Wine can dispense to all both Light and Heat.

Congreve, Imit. of Horace, I. ix. 2.

With helmy sweetness soothe the weary sense, And to the sickening soul thy cheering aid dispense.

Orville, Birth of Flattery.

He is delighted to dispense a share of it to all the company.

2. To administer; apply, as laws to particular cases; put in force.

When Rotten States are studiously mended from head to foot, proportions duly admeasured, Justice justly dispensed; then shall Rulers and Subjects have peace with God.

N. Ward, Simple Coder, p. 25.

We find him . . . scattering among his periods ambiguous words, whose interpretation he will afterwards dispense according to his pleasure.

Milton, On Def. of Humh. Remonst.

While you dispense the laws and guide the state.

Dryden.

3. To relieve; excuse; set free from an obligation; exempt; grant dispensation to.

P. Jun. A priest!
Cyn. O no, he is dispensed withal.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, III. 1.

Longinus dispenses himself from all investigations of this nature, by telling his friend Tarentianus that he already knows everything that can be said upon the question.

Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

4. To atone for; secure pardon or forgiveness for.

His sinne was dispensed With golde.

Gower, Conf. Amant., III.

= SYN. 1. Dispense, Distribute, Allot, Apportion, Assign. Dispense is to be distinguished from the others in that it expresses an indiscriminate or general giving, while they express a particular and personal giving: as, to distribute gifts; to assign the parts in a play, etc.

The great luminary
Dispenses light from far.

Milton, P. L., III. 679.

It is but reasonable to suppose that God should call men to an account in that capacity; and to distribute rewards and punishments according to the nature of their actions.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. iv.

How distant soever the time of our death may be, since it is certain that we must die, it is necessary to allot some portion of our life to consider the end of it.

Addison, Guardian, No. 18.

Money was raised by a forced loan, which was apportioned among the people according to the rate at which they had been assessed.

Macaulay, Nugent's Hampden.

God hath assign'd us.

Milton, P. L., I. 251.

II. intrans. 1. To make amends; compensate.

One loving howre
For many yeares of sorrow can dispense.

Spenser, F. Q., I. III. 20.

2. To bargain for a dispensation; compound.

Canst thou dispense with Heaven for such an oath?

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1.

Hence—To dispense with. (a.) To permit the neglect, disregard, or omission of, as a law, a ceremony, or an oath: as, the general dispense with all formalities.

He [the pope] hath dispensed with the oath and duty of subjects against the fifth commandment.

Sp. Andrews.

Don't you shudder at such perjury? and this in a republic, and where there is no religion that dispenses with oaths?

Walpole, Letters, II. 15.

Sympathizing too little with the popular worship, they worship by themselves and dispense with outward forms.

J. H. Seelye, Nat. Religion, p. 119.

(b) To give up the possession or use of; do without: as, to dispense with all but the bare necessities of life; I can dispense with your services.

He will dispense with his right to clear information.

Jeremy Collier.

Switzerland has altogether dispensed with the personal chief whom both Britain and America have kept in different shapes.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 282.

(c) To give up the observance or practice of; do away with; disregard.

With many rangers reard along the wall.

Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 29.

3. A larder; a spence. Mable.

dispenser (dis-pen'sér), n. [< ME. dispensen, dispenser, < OF. dispensier, dispenser, < ML. dispensarius, manager, steward, < dispensa, provision, buttery, larder; cf. equiv. OF. dispensator, dispensator, a steward, < L. dispensator, one who dispenses: see dispensator and dispense, n. Hence by aphoresis spencer, spencer. In mod. use dispenser is regarded as dispense, v., + -er.] 1. A manager; a steward.—2. One who dispenses or distributes; one who administers: as, a dispenser of medicines; a dispenser of gifts or favors; a dispenser of justice.

The good and merciful God grant, through the great steward and dispenser of his merces, Christ the Righteous.

Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. ii.

The drowy hours, dispensers of all good,
O'er the mute city stole with folded wings.

Tennyson, Gardener's Daughter.

dispensing (dis-pen'sing), p. a. 1. Of or pertaining to dispensation or the granting of dispensations; that may be exercised in relaxing the law, or in releasing from some legal obligation or penalty: as, the dispensing power of the pope.—2. That dispenses, deals out, or distributes: as, a dispensing chemist or druggist.

dispeople (dis-pé'pl), v. t.; pret. and pp. dispeopled, ppr. dispeopling. [< OF. despeupler, F. dépeupler (= Sp. despojar = Pg. despoovar), var., with prefix des-, of depopuler, depopuler, depopuler, < L. depopulari, ravage, depopulate: see depopulate and depopulate.] To depopulate; empty of inhabitants.

Let his heart exalt him in the harm
Already done, to have dispeopled heaven.

Milton, P. L., vii. 151.

France was almost dispeopled.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 2, 1665.

dispeopler (dis-pé'plér), n. [< dispeople + -er.] Cf. Sp. despojar = Pg. despoovar.] One who depopulates; a depopulator; that which deprives of inhabitants.

Thus then with force combin'd, the Lybian swains
Have quash'd the stern dispeopler of the plains.

W. L. Lewis, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, ix.

disperance, n. Same as desperance.

disperget (dis-per'j), v. t. [= Pr. disperger = It. dispergere, spargere, < L. dispergere, scatter about, disperse: see disperse.] To sprinkle.

dispermatous (di-spér'ma-tus), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + sperma(-), seed, + -ous.] Same as dispermous. Thomas.

dispermous (di-spér'mus), a. [< Gr. di-, two-, + sperma, seed, + -ous.] In bot., containing only two seeds: applied to fruits and their cells.

disperplet (dis-pér'pl), v. Same as disparple.

dispersal (dis-pér'sal), n. [< disperse + -al.] Dispersion.

In several places Republican meetings were frightened into dispersal by an aggressive display of force.

G. S. Merriam, A. Bowles, II. 229.

disperse (dis-pers'), v.; pret. and pp. dispersed, ppr. dispersing. [< F. disperser = Sp. Pg. dispersar, < L. disperere, pp. of dispergere, scatter abroad, disperse, < dis-, apart, + spargere, pp. sparsus, scatter: see spars.] I. trans. 1. To scatter; separate and send off or drive in different directions; cause to separate in different directions: as, to disperse a crowd.

Two lions in the still dark night
A herd of beoves disperse.

Chapman.

And now all things on both sides prepar'd, the Spanish Navy set forth out of the Groyne in May, but were dispersed and driven back by Weather.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 378.

Her feet disperse the powdery snow,
That rises up like smoke.

Wordsworth, Lucy Gray.

2. To distribute; dispense.

Being a king that loved wealth, he could not endure to have trade sick, nor any obstruction to continue in the gate vein which dispersed that blood.

Bacon.

The goods landed in the store houses here sent from thence, and dispersed it to his workmen in general.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 138.

3. To diffuse; spread.

The lips of the wise disperse knowledge. Prov. xv. 7.
He hath dispersed good sentences, like roses scattered on a dung-hill. Purshas, Pilgrimage, p. 256.

He [the admiral] gave order that the sick men should be scattered into divers ships, which dispersed the contagion exceedingly. Honell, Letters, I. iv. 17.

It was the end of the adversary to suppress, but Gods to propagate the Gospel; thence to smother and put out the light, Gods to communicate and disperse it to the utmost corners of the Earth.

T. Shepard, Clear Sunshine of the Gospel, Ded.

4. To make known; publish.

The poet entering on the stage to disperse the argument. B. Jonson.

Their own divulged and dispersed ignominy. Benvenuto, Passengers' Dialogues.

5. To dissipate; cause to vanish: as, the fog is dispersed.

I'll disperse the cloud
That hath so long obscur'd a bloody act
Ne'er equal'd yet.

Pleacher (and another?), Prophetess, II. 2.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Dispel, scatter, etc. See dissipate.—2. To distribute, deal out, disseminate, sow broadcast.

II. intrav. 1. To separate and move apart in different directions without order or regularity; become scattered: as, the company dispersed at 10 o'clock.

The clouds disperse in fumes, the wondering moon
Beholds her brother's steeds beneath her own.

Adams, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., II.

The odd went away, and the mob dispersed, and we directed a Moor to cry, That all people should in the night-time keep away from the tent, or they would be fired at.

Brace, Source of the Nile, I. 110.

2. To become diffused or spread; spread.

Th' Almighty Care doth diversely disperse
Ore all the parts of all this Universe.

Splendor, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 7.

3. To vanish by diffusion; be scattered out of sight.

Glory is like a circle in the water,
Which never ceaseth to enlarge itself,
Till, by broad spreading, it disperses to nought.

Shak., I Hen. VI., I. 2.

The dust towered into the air along the road and dispersed like the smoke of battle.

R. L. Stevenson, Silverado Squatters, p. 84.

disperse, a. [ME. dispersa, < OF. dispersa, dispara, < L. dispersus, scattered, pp. of dispergere, scatter: see disperse, v.] Scattered; dispersed. Gower.

dispersed (dis-pér'st'), p. a. [Pp. of disperse, v.] Scattered: specifically, in entom., said of spots, punctures, etc., which are placed irregularly, but near together—scattered being applied to spots that are both irregular and far apart.—dispersed harmony. See harmony.

dispersedly (dis-pér'sed-li), adv. In a dispersed manner; separately. Bailey, 1731.

dispersedness (dis-pér'sed-nes), n. The state of being dispersed or scattered. Bailey, 1728.

dispersedness (dis-pér'ses), n. A scattered state; sparseness; thinness.

The torrid parts of Africk are by Ptolemy resembled to a Libard's skin, the distance of whose spots represent the dispersedness of habitations or towns in Africk.

Brownwood, Languages.

disperser (dis-pér'sér), n. One who or that which disperses: as, a disperser of libels.

The disperser of this copy was one Munsey, of that college, whom (as he thought) they made their instrument. Strype, Abp. Whitgift (1595).

An iron or stone plate, 4 or 5 feet square, called the disperser, is placed over each fire [in brewing] to disperse the heat and prevent the malt immediately above from taking fire. Encyc. Brit., IV. 233.

dispersion (dis-pér'shon), n. [= F. dispersion = Pr. dispersio = Sp. dispersion = Pg. disperello = It. dispersione, spersione, < LL. dispersio (n.), a scattering, dispersion, < L. dispergere, pp. dispersus, scatter: see disperse, v.] 1. The act of dispersing or scattering.

Norway . . . was the great centre of dispersion of the ice [of the glacial epoch], and here it has been found that the sheet attained its greatest thickness.

J. Croft, Climate and Cosmology, p. 267.

2. The state of being dispersed or scattered abroad: as, the dispersion of the Jews.

He appeared to men and women, to the clergy and the laity, . . . to them in conjunction and to them in dispersion.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 68.

Thus, from the first, while the social structure of New England was that of concentration, the social structure of Virginia was that of dispersion.

M. C. Tyler, Hist. Amer. Lit., I. 88.

3. In optics, the separation of the different colored rays in refraction, arising from their different wave-lengths. The point of dispersion is the point where refracted rays begin to diverge. When a ray of sunlight is made to pass through prisms of different substances, but of such angles as to produce the same mean deviation of the ray, it is found that the spectra formed are of different lengths. Thus, the spectrum formed by a prism of oil of cassia is found to be two or three times longer than one formed by a glass prism; the oil of cassia is therefore said to disperse the rays of light more than the glass, or to have a greater dispersive power. It is also found that in spectra formed by prisms of different substances the colored spaces have to one another ratios differing from the ratios of the lengths of the spectra which they compose; and this property has been called the irradiability of dispersion or of the colored spaces in the spectrum. See prism and refraction.

Dispersion has been accounted for by the different speeds of light of different wave-lengths in the same refracting medium. Tait, Light, § 72.

In consequence of . . . dispersion of the colours in various directions of vibration, white light becomes broken up in a mode which is comparable with the dispersion of colour by ordinary refraction, and on this account has received the name of circular or rotary dispersion. Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 334.

4. In med. and surg., the scattering or removal of inflammation from a part and the restoration of the part to its natural state.—5. In math., the excess of the average value of a function at less than an infinitesimal distance from a point over the value at that point, this excess being divided by  $\sqrt{r}$  of the square of the limiting infinitesimal distance.—Abnormal dispersion, in optics, a phenomenon exhibited by solutions of some substances, as fuchsin, which give spectra differing from the usual prismatic spectrum in the order of the colors.—One of dispersion. See one.—Dispersion of the bisectrices, in crystal, the separation of the bisectrices for different colors observed in many monoclinic and triclinic crystals when the position of the three axes of light-elasticity is not the same for all the rays of the spectrum. It may be crossed, horizontal, or inclined. It is crossed when the acute bisectrix coincides with the ortho-diagonal axis. When a section of a biaxial crystal cut normal to the acute bisectrix is viewed in converging polarized light, the dispersion of the optic axes or bisectrices is generally marked by the arrangement of the colors in the interference-figures seen. It is horizontal when the obtuse bisectrix coincides with the orthodiagonal axis; and inclined, in monoclinic crystals, when the optic axes lie in the plane of symmetry.—Dispersion of the optic axes, in crystal, the separation of the axes for different colors in biaxial crystals, which takes place when the axial angles have different values; it is usually described as  $\rho > \nu$ , or  $\rho < \nu$ , according as the angle for red rays is greater or less than that for blue rays.—Eutectic dispersion. See eutectic.—The dispersion, the Jews dispersed among the Gentiles during and after the Babylonian captivity; the dispersa: most frequently used of the scattered communities of Jews referred to in the New Testament, either of such communities collectively and in general, or of the communities in some single country or group of countries: as, the Parthian dispersion; the dispersion of Asia Minor; the Egyptian dispersion; the dispersion in Rome. See dispar.

The epistle [of James] is addressed "to the twelve tribes which are of the dispersion." Encyc. Brit., XIII. 553.

dispersive (dis-pér'siv), a. [= OF. F. dispersif; as disperse + -ive.] Pertaining to dispersion; dispersing; separating and scattering.

By its dispersive power [that of a particular kind of glass, as flint, crown, etc.] is meant its power of separating the colors so as to form a spectrum, or to produce chromatic aberration. Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 61.

dispersively (dis-pér'siv-li), adv. In a dispersive manner; by dispersion: as, dispersively refracted light.

dispersiveness (dis-pér'siv-nes), n. Dispersive quality or state.

dispersonalize (dis-pér'son-al-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dispersonalized, ppr. dispersonalizing. [< dis-priv. + person + -ize.] To disguise the personality of; render impersonal; dispersonate. [Rare.]

I regret that I killed off Mr. Wilbur so soon, for he would have enabled me . . . to dispersonalize myself into a vicarious egotism. Lowell, Biglow Papers, Int.

dispersonate (dis-pér'son-át), v. t.; pret. and pp. dispersonated, ppr. dispersonating. [< dis-priv. + personate. Cf. ML. dispersonare, pp. dispersonatus, treat injuriously, insult.] To divest of personality or individuality; dispersonate. Hare. [Rare.]

dispersonification (dis-pér'son'i-fi-ká'shon), n. [< dispersonify: see -fy and -ation.] The act of divesting an animate object of whatever personal attributes had been ascribed to it. [Rare.]

The ascription of social actions and political events entirely to natural causes, thus leaving out Providence as a factor, seems to the pious mind of our day as seemed to the mind of the pious Greek the dispersonification of Helios and the explanation of celestial motions otherwise than by immediate divine agency.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 292.

dispersonify (dis-pér'son'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. dispersonified, ppr. dispersonifying. [< dis-priv. + personify.] To divest of ascribed personality or personal attributes. [Rare.]

When the positive spirits of inquiry had made considerable progress, Anaxagoras and other astronomers incurred the charge of blasphemy for dispersonifying Helios, and trying to assign invariable laws to the solar phenomena. Crote, quoted in H. Spencer's Study of Sociol., p. 292.

dispill, v. t. [< dis-, apart, + spill.] To spill.

For I have boldly blood full piteously disfilled. The World and the Child (1832) (Hazlitt's Dodley, I. 251).

dispirit (dis-pir'it), v. t. [For dispirit, < dis-priv. + spirit.] 1. To depress the spirits of; deprive of courage; discourage; dishearten; deject; cast down.

Not dispirited with my afflictions. Dryden.

Our men are dispirited, and not likely to get anything by fighting with them. Leslow, Memoirs, I. 203.

The debilitating effect of the stroke upon the system, and its lowering and dispiriting influence upon the mind, are due to a heated atmosphere surcharged with moisture. Huxley and Yessens, Physiol., § 202.

2. To exhaust the spirits or bodily vigor of. [Rare.]

He has dispirited himself by a debauch. Collier.

=Syn. 1. To damp, depress, intimidate, daunt. dispirited (dis-pir'it-ed), p. a. [Pp. of dispirit, v.] 1. Indicating depression of spirits; discouraged; dejected.

Arribato . . . seen Revulgo at a distance, on a Sunday morning, ill-dressed, and with a dispirited air.

Tobner, Span. Lit., I. 232.

2. Spiritless; tame; wanting vigor: as, a poor, dispirited style.

Dispirited recitations. Hammond, Works, IV., Pret.

dispiritly (dis-pir'i-ted-li), adv. In a dispirited manner; dejectedly.

dispiritiveness (dis-pir'i-ted-nes), n. Depression of spirits; dejection.

Arremonal apneas have . . . caused, in some, great faintness and dispiritiveness. Boyle, Works, V. 46.

dispiritment (dis-pir'it-ment), n. The act of dispiriting, or the state of being dispirited or dejected; discouragement.

You honestly quit your tools: quit a most muddy, confused coil of work, short rations, of sorrow, dispiritments, and contradictions, having now done with it all.

Carlyle.

There are few men who can put forth all their muscle in a losing race; and it is characteristic of losing that what he wrote under the dispiritment of failure should be the most lively and vigorous.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 232.

dispire, v. t. An obsolete form of despire.

dispite, n. and v. An obsolete form of despite.

dispiteous, a. See despiteous.

dispitously, adv. See despitously.

displace (dis-plás'), v. t.; pret. and pp. displaced, ppr. displacing. [< OF. displacer, F. displacer, displace, < des-priv. + placer, place: see place.] 1. To remove to a different place; put out of the usual or proper place: as, to displace books or papers.

The greenhouse is my summer seat:
My shrubs displace d from that retreat
Enjoy'd the open air.

Cowper, The Faithful Bird.

2. To remove from any position, office, or dignity; depose: as, to displace an officer of government.

Liable not only to have its acts annulled by him, but to be displaced, as regards the individuals composing it, or annihilated as an institution. Brougham.

The wish of the ministry was to displace Hastings, and to put Clavering at the head of the government. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

3. To disorder; disturb; spoil.

You have displaced the mirth, broke the good meeting,
With most adm'r'd disorder. Shak., Macbeth, tit. 4.

4. To take the place of; replace.

Each kingdom or principality had its bishop, who in no way displaced the king or seignior, but took his place alongside of him. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 142.

=Syn. 2. To dislodge, oust, dismiss, discharge.

displaceable (dis-plás-sá-bl), a. [< displace + -able.] Susceptible of being displaced or removed. Imp. Diet.

displaced (dis-plást'), p. a. [Pp. of displace, v.] Removed from a particular regiment, but at liberty to serve in some other corps: applied to certain officers in the British service when so transferred by reason of misconduct, or for any other cause.

displacement (dis-plás'ment), n. [= F. déplacement; as displace + -ment.] 1. A putting out of place; removal from a former or usual or proper place, or from a position, dignity, or office.

The displacement of the centres of the orbits. Adams Researches.

Unnecessary displacement of funds. A. Hamilton.

Before we can ascertain the rate of motion of a star from its angular displacement of position in a given time, we must know its absolute distance.

J. Orell, Cosmos and Cosmology, p. 222.

2. A putting in the place of another or of something else; substitution in place; replacement by exchange.

The French term replacement is usually but inaccurately rendered replacement; the true meaning of the latter word is putting back into its place, and not displacement or substitution, which conveys the meaning of the French word more correctly.

W. A. Miller, Chemistry, III, § 1072.

3. In hydroe., the quantity of a liquid which is displaced by a solid body placed in it. If the weight of the displacement is greater than or equal to that of the body, the latter will float; if less, it will sink to the bottom, as a stone. A buoyant material sinks to a level where the pressure of the fluid displaced is sufficient to counterbalance its weight. The term is most frequently used in connection with ships: as, a ship of 3,000 tons displacement.

4. In pharm., a method by which the active principles of organic bodies are extracted from them. The body, reduced to a powder, is subjected to the action of a liquid which dissolves the soluble matter. When this has been sufficiently charged, it is displaced or replaced by a quantity of the same or of another liquid. Same as percolation.

5. In mech., the geometrical difference or exact relation between the position of a body at any moment and its initial position.

The curve which represents the history of the displacements of all particles at the same time represents also the history of the displacement of any one particle at different times.

Minkin, Uniplanar Kinematics, I, 10.

Center of displacement. See center. — Composition of displacements. See composition. — Displacement diagram or polygon. See diagram. — Displacement of zero, in thermoelectricity, the change (rise) in the position of the zero of a thermometer often observed a considerable length of time after it has been made, and regarded as due to a gradual change in the bulb, produced by the atmospheric pressure. — Electric displacement, the quantitative measure of the electric polarization of a dielectric. The quantity of electricity which flows across any plane in a dielectric due to a change of the electric forces is the electric displacement across that plane.

Further, he [Maxwell] has regarded the electric charge of the system as the surface manifestation of a change which took place in the medium when the electrification was set up. This change he has called Electric Displacement.

A. Gray, Absol. Meas. in Elect. and Mag., I, 122.

Tangential displacement of a curve, the integral of the tangential components of the displacement of elements of the curve. It makes a difference whether this be reckoned tangentially to the initial or to the final position of the curve; and it depends not merely on the positions of the curve, but also on the corresponding points.

displacement (dis-plā'sh-ēn), n. [ML. displacentia, restored form of L. displacentia (> E. displacentia, displacement), dialike, dissatisfaction, < displacent (t-s), ppr. of displacere, ML. also displacere, displace: see displace. Cf. displacence, displacement, displacement, doublets of displacement.] Dialike; dissatisfaction; displeasure.

A displacement at the good of others, because they enjoy it though not unworthy of it, is an absurd depravity.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., I, 12.

displacer (dis-plā'sér), n. 1. One who or that which displaces. — 2. In chem., an apparatus used in the chemical process of displacement or percolation; a percolator.

displant (dis-plānt'), v. t. [OF. desplanter, F. déplanter = Sp. Pg. desplanter = It. displanter, displanter, < *ML. as if *displanter*, < L. dis-priv. + plantare, plant: see plant, v.] 1. To pluck up; to dislodge from a state of being planted, settled, or fixed.

Unless philosophy can make a Juliet, Displant a town, reverse a prince's doom.

Shak., R. and J., III, 2.

But after the Ionians and Greeks had planted certain Colonies thereabout, and displaced the barbarous, it [the Black Sea] was called Euxine. Sandys, Travels, p. 30.

2. To strip of what is planted, settled, or established: as, to displant a country of inhabitants.

They [the French] had them tell all the plantations, as far as forty degrees, that they would come with eight ships, next year, and displant them all.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I, 122.

displantation (dis-plan-tā'sh-n), n. [F. déplantation = Sp. desplantation = It. displantation; as displant + -ation.] The act of displanting; removal; displacement.

displat (dis-plāt'), v. t. [pret. and pp. displated, ppr. displating.] [dis-priv. + plat.] To untwist; uncurl. Rabelais.

display (dis-plā'), v. [ME. displayen, displayen, < OF. desplayier, desplayier, despleier, despleier, F. déployer (> E. deploy, q. v.) = Pr. desplegar, desplegar = Sp. desplegar = Pg. despregar = It. dispiegare, spiegare, < ML. displicare, unfolded, display, L. (in pp. displicatus) scatter, < L. dis- spart, + placere, fold: see plait, placere. Hence by aphoristic spicy, q. v.] I. trans. 1. To unfold; lay open; spread out; expand; disclose, as in carving or dissecting a body.

Berthe up his fetherys displayed like a sayle.

Lydgate, Minor Poems, p. 122.

Displays that crane. Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 225.

So having said, oftentimes he can display

His painted nimble wings, and vanish quite away.

Spenser, F. Q., II, viii, 8.

The Sunne no sooner displayed his beames, than the Tartar his colours. Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I, 27.

2. To show; expose to the view; exhibit to the eyes; especially, to show ostentatiously; parade flauntingly.

For then the choice and prime women of the City, if the deceased were of note, do amaze their discipules, with bosoms displayed.

Sandys, Travels, p. 65.

Proudly displaying the insignia of their order. Prescott.

He spoke, and one among his gentlewomen

Display'd a splendid silk of foreign loom,

Where like a shalloon sea the lovely blue

Play'd into green. Tennyson, Geraint.

3. To exhibit to the mind; make manifest or apparent; bring into notice: as, to display one's ignorance or folly.

His growth now to youth's full flower, displaying

All virtue, grace, and wisdom to achieve

Things highest, greatest. Milton, P. R., I, 67.

Paint the Reverse of what you've seen to Day,

And in holi Strokes the vicious Town display.

Congress, Opening of the Queen's Theatre, Epil.

Nothing can be more admirable than the skill which Socrates displays in the conversations which Plato has reported or invented. Macaulay, History.

It is in the realising of grand character that the strength of historical genius chiefly displays itself.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 28.

In fact, we may say that the great mass of purely biological phenomena may be displayed for some time by an organism detached from its medium, as by a fish out of water.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 54.

4. To discover; discern.

And from his seat took pleasure to display

The city so adorned with towers.

Chapman, Iliad, xi, 74.

5. In printing, to make conspicuous or attractive; give special prominence to, as particular words or lines, by the use of larger type, wider space, etc. — Syn. 2. To parade, show off.

II. trans. 1. To lay anything open, as in carving or dissecting.

He carves, displays, and cuts up to a wonder. Spectator.

2. To make a show or display. — 3. To make a great show of words; talk demonstratively.

The very fellow which of late

Display'd so saucily against your highness.

Shak., Lea. II, 4.

display (dis-plā'), n. [display, v.] An opening, unfolding, or disclosing; a spreading of anything to the view, commonly with the sense of ostentation or a striving for effect; show; exhibition: as, a great display of banners; a display of jewelry.

He died, as erring men should die,

Without display, without parade.

Byron, Parisina, xvii.

Human nature, it is true, remains always the same, but the displays of it change. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 222.

— Syn. Show, Parade, etc. See ostentation.

displayed (dis-plād'), p. a. [Pp. of display, v.]

1. Unfolded; opened; spread; expanded; manifested; disclosed. — 2. In her.: (a) Having the wings expanded: said of a bird used as a bearing, especially a bird of prey. Compare disclosed.

(b) Gardant and extendant: said of a beast used as a bearing.

[Rare.] Also extendant. — 3. In printing, printed in larger or more prominent type, or conspicuously arranged to attract attention. — Descendant displayed. See descendant.

— Displayed forthwith, in her., represented with the wings extended and with the head outward, as if flying out of the field: said of a bird used as a bearing. — Displayed recumbent, in her., having the wings crossed behind the back: said of a bird used as a bearing. The bird is generally represented showing the back; when in this position, it is sometimes said to be displayed tergite.

displayer (dis-plā'ér), n. One who or that which displays.

The displayer of his high frontiers.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote.

display-letter (dis-plā'let'ér), n. Same as display-type.

display-stand (dis-plā'stānd), n. A rack, shelf, or other contrivance for showing goods in a window or on a counter.

display-type (dis-plā'tip), n. A type, or collectively types, of a style more prominent or attractive than the ordinary text-type. Also display-letter.

disciple (dis-pl'), v. t. [Contr. of disciple, v.] To discipline.

And bitter Penance, with an iron whip,

Was wont him once to disciple every day.

Spenser, F. Q., I, x, 27.

displeasance (dis-plē'sāns), n. [Early mod. E. also displeasance; < ME. displeasance, displeasance, < AF. displeasance, OF. displeasance, displeasance, F. déplaisance = Pr. desplaisansa = Sp. Pg. desplacencia = It. displacencia, displacencia, spiacencia, < ML. displacentia (> E. displacency), a restored form of L. displacentia (> E. displacence), displeasure, dissatisfaction, discontent: see displacement, displacant, displease, and cf. pleasance.] Displeasure; dissatisfaction; discontent; annoyance; vexation.

Such greues & many other happyth vnto the hunter, whyche he displeasance of theym yf love it I dare not report. Jul. Berner, Treatise of Fyrynyng, fol. 1, back.

Cordeill said she lov'd him as behov'd:

Whose ample answers, wanting colours fayre

To paint it forth, him to displeasance mov'd.

Spenser, F. Q., II, x, 22.

displeasanti (dis-plē'sant'), a. [*ME. *displeasanti*, < *AF. *displeasanti*, restored form of OF. desplaisant, F. déplaisant, < ML. displacēt(t)-s, L. displacēt(t)-s, ppr. of displacere, ML. also displacere, displeas: see displeasance. Cf. pleasanti.] Unpleasant or unpleasant; showing or giving displeasure.

The King's highness, at his uprising and coming thereunto, may finde the said chamber pure, cleane, wholesome, and meete, without any displeasance aye or thing, as the health, comendity, and pleasure of his most noble person doth require.

Quoted in Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 224.

If it were God's pleasure to give them into their enemies' hands, it was not they that ought to show one displeasance look or countenance there against.

Munday (Arber's Eng. Garner, I, 222).

That no man would invite

The poet from us, to sup forth to-night,

If he play please. If it displeasance be,

We do presume that no man will.

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, v, 5.

displeasantly (dis-plē'sant-lī), adv. Unpleasantly; offensively.

He thought verily the Emperor should take it more displeasantly than if his holiness had declared himself.

Strype, Hen. VIII., an. 1522.

displease (dis-plēz'), v.; pret. and pp. displeased, ppr. displeasing. [ME. displeasen, displeasen, < *AF. *displeaser*, OF. despleisir, later despleire, mod. F. déplaire = Pr. despleaser = Sp. despleacer = Pg. despleazar = It. displicare, splicare, < ML. displicare, restored form of L. displicere, displeas, < dis-priv. + placere, please: see please.] I. trans. 1. To fail to please; offend; be disagreeable to; excite aversion in: as, acrid and rancid substances displease the taste; glaring colors displease the eye; his conduct displeased his relatives.

God was displeased with this thing; therefore he smote Israel. 1 Chron. xxi, 7.

If strange meats displease,

Art can deceive, or hunger force my taste.

Donne, Satires.

Soon as the unwelcome news

From earth arrived at heaven-gate, displeased

All were who heard. Milton, P. L., x, 22.

Adversity is so wholesome, . . . why should we be displeased with it?

Barrone, Works, III, vii.

Always teasing others, always teased,

His only pleasure is — to be displeased.

Cowper, Conversation.

displeasingness (dis-plé' sing-nes), n. Distastefulness; offensiveness; the quality of giving some degree of annoyance or offense.

displeasurable (dis-plé' jr-a-bl), a. [< dis-priv. + pleasurable.] Disagreeable; giving or imparting no pleasure.

The pleasures men gain by labouring in their vocations, and receiving in one form or another returns for their services, usually have the drawback that the labours are in a considerable degree displeasurable.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 102.

displeasure (dis-plé' jr), n. [*< AF. displeasure (F. déplaisir), < *displacere, OF. desplaisir, F. déplaire, displeace; see displeace, and cf. dis- and pleasure.*] 1. The state of feeling displeased; specifically, a feeling of intense or indignant disapproval, as of an act of disobedience, injustice, etc.; as, an man incurs the displeasure of another by thwarting his views or schemes; a servant incurs the displeasure of his master by neglect or disobedience; we experience displeasure at any violation of right or decorum.

The States return answer, That they are heartily sorry they should incur her displeasure by conferring upon the Earl of Leicester that absolute Authority, not having first made her acquainted. Baker, Chronicles, p. 283.

They even meet to complain, censure, and remonstrate, when a governor gives displeasure. Brougham.

2. Discomfort; uneasiness; dolefulness: opposed to pleasure. [Archaic.]

A feeling . . . as distinct and recognizable as the feeling of pleasure in a sweet taste or of displeasure at a toothache. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 128.

3. Offense; umbrage. [Archaic.]

King Lewis took displeasure that his daughter was not crowned as well as her husband. Baker, Chronicles, p. 54.

4. A displeasing or offensive act; an act which causes, or is fitted to cause or rouse, a feeling of dissatisfaction, annoyance, or resentment; an ill turn or affront: generally preceded by do.

Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure. Judges xv. 3.

5. A state of disgrace or disfavor.

He went into Poland, being in displeasure with the pope for overmuch familiarity. Peacham, Music.

—Syn. 1. Dissatisfaction, disapprobation, distaste, dislike, anger, vexation, indignation, resentment, annoyance.

displeasure (dis-plé' jr), v. t. [< displeasure, n.] To displease; be displeasing or annoying to; as, it displeases me to see so much waste. [Archaic.]

When the way of pleasuring and displeasuring lieth by the favourite, it is impossible any other should be over great. Bacon, Ambition.

displensh (dis-plén' ish), v. t. [< dis-priv. + plensh.] To dislensh; deprive of plenshing; dispose of the plenshing of; render void or destitute: as, a displenshing sale (that is, one in which the entire household furniture is disposed of). [Scotch and North. Eng.]

It was admitted, indeed, that large areas of forest-land had been displenshed. Gribble, Ice Age, p. 1.

displenshment (dis-plén' ish-ment), n. 1. The act of displenshing. — 2. The condition of being displenshed.

displacement (dis-plén' sh-ment), n. [< L. displacencia, displeasure, dissatisfaction; see displacement, displeasure, doublets of displacement, displacency.] Displeasure; dislike. [Rare.]

He, then, is the best scholar, that studieth the least, by his own arguments, to clear to himself these obscure interjections of displacement and ill-humour. W. Montague, Devout Essay, l.

Hence arose, . . . I will not say a grudge against them, for they had no sin, yet a kind of displacement with them, as mere creatures. Goodwin, Works, I. l. 136.

In so far as a man's life consists in the abundance of the things he possesses, we see then why it dwindles with these. The like holds where self-complacency or displacement rests on a basis of personal worth or on the honour or affection of others. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 70.

displodet (dis-plód' et), v. [< L. displodere, pp. displonus, spread out, burst asunder, < dis-, asunder, + plaudere, strike, clap, beat. Cf. applaud, explode.] I. intrans. To burst with a loud report; explode.

Like rubbish from disploding engines thrown. Young, Night Thoughts, v.

II. trans. To cause to burst with a loud report; explode.

Stood rank'd of seraphim another row,

Of thunder. Milton, P. L., vi. 606.

displodion (dis-plód' shn), n. [*< L. as if *displodio(n)-, < displodere, pp. displonus, burst asunder - see explode.*] The act of disploding; explosion.

The vast displodion dissipates the clouds.

Young, Night Thoughts, ix.

displodive (dis-plód' iv), a. [< L. displodius, pp. of displodere, displode, + -ive.] Explosive.

displume (dis-plóm'), v. t.; pret. and pp. displumed, ppr. displuming. [< OF. desplumer, F. déplumer = Sp. Pg. desplumar = It. epilumare, strip of feathers, < L. dis-priv. + plumare, feather: see plume, v. Cf. depilume.] To strip or deprive of plumes or feathers; hence, to strip of honors, or of badges of honor.

You have sent them to us . . . so displumed, degraded, and metamorphosed, such unfeathered two-legged things, that we no longer know them. Burke, Rev. in France.

The sun shone wide over open uplands, the displumed hills stood clear against the sky.

R. L. Stevenson, Silverado Squatters, p. 17.

dispoint (dis-póint'), v. t. [< dis-priv. + point, n.] To deprive of a point or points.

While Nergal speeds his Victory too fast,
His hooks dis-pointed disappoint his haste.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Decay.

dispondaic (di-spon-dá' ik), a. [As dispondeo + -ic, after spondaic.] Of or pertaining to a disponde; consisting of or constituting two spondees: as, the dispondaic close of a dactylic hexameter.

disponde (di-spon-dé), n. [< L. dispondus, LL. also dispondius, < Gr. δεικνύειν, a double spondee, < di-, two-, + σpondeος, spondee: see spondee.] In pros., a double spondee; two spondees regarded as forming one compound foot.

dispondeus (di-spon-dé' us), n.; pl. dispondei (-i). [< L. see dispondeo.] Same as disponde.

dispone (dis-pón'), v.; pret. and pp. disponed, ppr. disponing. [Formerly also dispon; < ME. disponen, < OF. disponer, disposer, dispondere, exponere, expound, explain, F. dial. depondre, disjoin, detach, let go, = Sp. disponer = Pg. dispor = It. disporre, disponere = D. disponeren = G. disponiren = Dan. disponere = Sw. disponera, dispose, < L. disponere, pp. dispositus, set in different places, distribute, arrange, set in order, dispose, settle, determine, < dis-, apart, in different directions, + ponere, set, place: see ponent, and cf. dispone.] I. trans. 1. To set in order; arrange; dispose.

Syn God seth every thing, out of dountance,
And hem disponeth thorough his ordinaunce.

Martin (E. E. T. A.), II. 130.

Our Lord and Saviour himself did hope by disputation not only of, but against the truth, albeit with purpose for the truth.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, III. 8.

2. An exercise in which parties debate and argue on some question proposed, as in a school or college. The medieval logics, under the head of obligations, give minute rules for these exercises. The first party, the respondent, undertakes to defend a given thesis. The second party, the opponent, begins by giving a number of arguments against the thesis. If there are several opponents, they all offer arguments. The respondent then gives positive reasons in syllogistic form, after which he responds briefly to all the arguments of the opponents in order. The latter may or may not be allowed to reply. Finally, the moderator sums up and renders his decision. Dialectical disputation concerns a matter of certain knowledge. Dialectical disputation is intended to try the knowledge of the parties, or of one of the 2. Sophistical disputation is intended to deceive.

All the disputation of the learned never brought to light one effect of nature before unknown.

Bacon, Praise of Knowledge (1600), Works, VIII. 124.

Academical disputations are two-fold, ordinary and extraordinary. Ordinary disputations are those which are privately performed in colleges every day . . . in term-time; extraordinary disputations I call those that are performed in the public schools of the university as requisite qualifications for degrees.

Aukerst, Terre Filius (March 24, 1721), No. xx.

At Cambridge, in my day [1823-27], . . . every B. A. was obliged to perform a certain number of disputations.

Some were performed in earnest: the rest were huddled over. . . . The real disputations were very severe exercises. I was haggard for two hours with arguments given and answered in Latin . . . against Newton's first section, Lagrange's derived functions, and Locke on innate principles. De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes, p. 306.

Augustine disputation. See Augustine.

disputations (dis-pū-tā'-shus), a. [disputatio + -ous.] 1. Pertaining to or characterized by disputation; controversial; polemical; contentious: as, a disputations temper.

The Christian doctrine of a future life was no recommendation of the new religion to the wits and philosophers of that disputations period. Buckminster.

They began to contract a disputations turn, which Franklin says he had already caught by reading his father's books of dispute on religion. Everett, Orations, II. 17.

2. Inclined to dispute or wrangle; apt to debate, cavil, or controvert: as, a disputations theologian.

Religious, moral, both in word and deed,
But warmly disputations in his creed.

Crabbe, Works, VII. 67.

I shall not, therefore, I think, rightly be thought rash or disputations if I venture to express differences from those modern political schools with which I feel that I cannot sympathize at all.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 225.

disputatiously (dis-pū-tā'-shus-lī), adv. In a disputatious manner.

disputatiousness (dis-pū-tā'-shus-ness), n. The quality of being disputatious.

dispute (dis-pū't), n. [= D. disput = G. disput, disput = Dan. Sw. disput, disput, < F. dispute = Sp. Pg. It. disputa, dispute, from the verb.]

1. Argumentative contention; earnest discussion of opposing views or opinions; controversial strife.

This . . . produced a dispute attended with some acrimony. Goldsmith, Vicar, ii.

Disputes are multiplied as if everything were uncertain, and these disputes are managed with the greatest warmth, as if everything were certain. Hume, Human Nature, Int.

From expostulations with the king, the matter of religion turned into disputes among the priests, at which the king always assisted in person.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 196.

2. Wrangling; contention; strife; quarrel.

Could we forbear dispute and practise love,

We should agree as angels do above. Waller, Divine Love, III.

Nor is it aught but just
 That he who in debate of truth hath won Should win in arms, in both disputes alike Victor. Milton, P. L., vi. 122.

3. A contest of any kind.

The four Men of War made sail for the forts, against which we anchored about one in the afternoon; and after four hours' dispute [firing], went to the westward.

Retaking of the Island of Santa Helena (Arber's Eng. [Gardner], I. 61).

Beyond, without, or past dispute, indisputably; incontrovertibly.

In prose and verse was owned without dispute
 Through all the realms of nonsense absolute.

Dryden.

He . . . forged and falsified

One letter called Pompey's, past dispute.

Browning, King and Book, I. 136.

To be in dispute, to be under discussion; be the subject of controversy.—Syn. Controversy, Dispute (see controversy), debate, discussion, altercation.

disputer (dis-pū'tēr), n. One who disputes, or who is given to disputation or controversy.

Where is the disputer of this world? 1 Cor. i. 20.

It is enough to weary the spirit of a disputer, that he shall argue till he hath lost his voice, and his time, and sometimes the question too; and yet no man shall be of his mind more than was before.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), Ded.

disputiscent, n. A Middle English form of disputation.

disqualification (dis-kwō'l-i-fī-kā'shən), n. [= F. déqualification; as dis- + qualification. See disqualify.] 1. The act of disqualifying.—2. The state of being disqualified; want of qualification; absence or deprivation of ability, power, or capacity; any disability or incapacity.

I must still retain the consciousness of those disqualifications which you have been pleased to overlook.

Sir J. Shore.

3. That which disqualifies or incapacitates: as, conviction of crime is a disqualification for public office.

It is recorded as a sufficient disqualification of a wife, that, speaking of her husband, she said, "God forgive him." Spectator.

In society, high advantages are set down to the individual as disqualifications. Emerson, Society and Solitude.

disqualify (dis-kwō'l-i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. disqualified, ppr. disqualifying. [= F. déqualifier; as dis- + qualify.] To deprive of the necessary qualifications; deprive of natural or legal power, or the qualities or rights necessary for some purpose; disable; unfit: generally with for, sometimes with from: as, ill health disqualifies the body for labor and the mind for study; a conviction of perjury disqualifies a man for being a witness.

Men are not disqualified by their engagements in trade from being received in high society. Southey.

In spite of the law disqualifying hired champions, it is pretty clear that they were always to be had for money.

C. H. Pearson, Early and Mid. Ages of Eng.

Instead of educating himself to take his place in the world, he has disqualified himself for being anything but a student all his life.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 103.

Sir M. Hale, Enquiry touching Happiness.

dissatisfactory (dis-sat-is-fak'tō-ri), a. [< dissatisfy + satisfactory.] Not satisfactory; unsatisfying; displeasing.

To have reduced the different qualifications in the different states to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the states as difficult for the convention.
A. Hamilton.

dissatisfied (dis-sat'is-fid), p. a. 1. Discontented; not satisfied; not pleased; offended.

The dissatisfied factions of the autocracy. Bancroft.
2. Arising from or manifesting dissatisfaction: as, a dissatisfied look.

The camels were groaning laboriously, and the horses were standing around in dissatisfied silence in the white heat of noon.
O'Donovan, Merv, xxiv.

dissatisfy (dis-sat'is-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. dissatisfied, ppr. dissatisfying. [< dissatisfy + satisfy.] To render discontented; displease; frustrate or come short of one's wishes or expectations.

When a new government is established, by whatever means, the people are commonly dissatisfied.
Hume, The Original Contract.

The Italian allies, who had borne so great a share of the burden of Rome's conquests, and who had reaped so small a share of their fruits, were naturally dissatisfied with their dependent position.

dissavage (dis-sav'ij), v. t.; pret. and pp. dissaved, ppr. dissaving. [< diss-priv. + savage.] To tame; civilize.

That halvend shal ben stole ar hit come togidre and accounted.
Political Songs (ed. Wright), p. 237.

disscepter, v. t. [OF. descepter, F. descepter, deprive of a scepter, deposer, < diss-priv. + sceptre, scepter: see diss- and scepter, v.] To deprive of a scepter.

A hundred kings, whose temples were impall'd
In golden diadems, set here and there With diamonds, and gemmed every where,
And of their golden virgins none disscepter were.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph on Earth.

dissent (dis-sēt'), v. t. [< diss-priv. + sent.] To dissent; overthrow.

Seyton! I am sick at heart
When I behold—Seyton, I say—This push
Will cheer me ever, or dissent me now.

disssect (di-sekt'), v. t. [< L. dissectus, pp. of dissecare (> Sp. dissecar = Pg. dissecar = F. dissecquer = D. dissekoren = Dan. dissekere = Sw. dissekera), cut asunder, cut up, < diss-, asunder, + secare, cut: see section.] 1. To cut in pieces; divide into parts with or as with a cutting instrument: as, to disssect a fowl. Specifically—2. To cut in pieces, or separate the distinct or elementary parts of, as an animal or a plant, for the purpose of studying its organization or the functions and morbid affections of its organs and tissues; anatomize.

Where, with blunted knives, his scholars learn How to disssect, and the nice joints discern.
Congress, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, xi.

Like following life through creatures you disssect,
You lose it in the moment you detect.
Pope, Moral Essays, I. 29.

Hence—3. To examine part by part or point by point; treat or consider piecemeal; analyze, as for the purpose of criticism; describe in detail: as, to disssect a man's character.

Chief mastery to disssect
With long and tedious havoc fabled knights,
In battle foign'd.
Milton, P. L., ix. 29.

If men can so hardly endure to have the deformity of their vices represented to them though very imperfectly here, how will they bear the disssecting and laying them open in the view of the whole world?

Sittingdust, Sermons, I. xi.
Dissected map or picture, a map or picture mounted on a board and divided into more or less irregular parts, designed to be joined together as a puzzle.

See dissseisin.

Then thus gan Jove: Right true it is, that these
And all things else that under heaven dwell
Are chaung'd of Time, who doth them all dissseine
Of being.
Spenser, F. Q., VII. vii. 48.

A man may frequently suppose himself to be dissseined, when he is not so in fact.
Blackstone, Com., III. 10.

And pilfering what I once did give,
Dissseine thee of thy right.
G. Herbert, Submission.

dissseine (dis-sēs'), n. [< dissseine + -eol.] In law, a person unlawfully put out of possession of an estate. Also spelled dissseins.

dissseisin (dis-sēs'in), n. [Also dissseisin; < OF. (AF.) dissseisin, m., dissseine, dissseine, dissseine, dissseine, dissseine, dissseine, dissseine, dissseine: see dissseine, and of seisin.] In law: (a) In the most general sense, the wrongful privation of seisin; ouster. (b) In old Eng. law, the violent termination of seisin by the actual ouster of the feudal tenant, and the usurpation of his place and relation. It was a notorious and tortious act on the part of the dissseisor, by which he put himself in the place of the dissseinee, and, in the character of tenant of the freehold, made his appearance at the lord's court. (Kent.) In more modern use it includes silent entry and usurpation of enjoyment, under pretense of right, with or without title.—Anne's of novel dissseisin, an obsolete common-law writ for the recovery of land, where the defendant himself had been turned out of possession.—Dissseisin by election, a legal fiction by which the owner was permitted to admit that he had been dissseined, irrespective of the actual fact of technical dissseisin, in order to have a remedy against the adverse claimant.—Equitable dissseisin, the loss or deprivation of an equitable seisin: a term sometimes used, but disapproved by the highest authorities. (Compare for the analogies afforded by similar phrases, equitable waste, under waste; equitable estate, under estate; and equitable action, under action.)
dissseisor (dis-sēs'sör), n. [Also dissseisor, dissseiser; < OF. (AF.) dissseisor, dissseisor, dissseiser, dissseise: see dissseine.] In law, one who wrongfully dispossesses another, or puts another out of possession.

Where ent'ring now by force, thou hold'st by might,
And art dissseisor of another's right.
Drayton, Barons' Wars, III.

dissseisorens (dis-sēs'sör-es), n. [< dissseisor + -es.] In law, a woman who wrongfully puts another out of possession. Also spelled dissseisorens. [Rare.]

I took the only precaution in my power, viz., to unfasten the chain, trek-tow, from the dissseiboam, so that that important portion of my gear should not act as a conductor to the inflammable part of my load.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 619.

disssemblable (di-sem'blā-bl), a. [< OF. dessemblable, F. dessemblable (= Sp. dessemejable), < dessembler, be different: see dessemble, and cf. semblable.] Not resembling; dissimilar. Puttenham.

disssemblance (di-sem'blāns), n. [< OF. dessemblance, F. dessemblance (= Fr. dessemblance = Sp. dessemblanza, dessemejansa = Pg. dessemblança = It. disssemiglianza), < dessemblant, unlike, different, ppr. of dessembler, be unlike: see dessemble, and cf. semblance.] Want of resemblance; dissimilarity. [Rare.]

Nor can there be a greater disssemblance between one wise man and another.
Osborne, Advice to a Son.

It must, however, be remembered that the disssemblance of the hieroglyphic and hieratic characters appears greater than it really is. Jones Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 100.

disssemblance (di-sem'blāns), n. [< disssemblable + -ance; the same in form as disssemblance, but with sense due directly to disssemble.] The act of or faculty for disssembling.

I wanted those old instruments of state,
Disssemblance and suspect.
Marston and Webster, The Malcontent, I. 4.

Without disssemblance he is deep in age.
Middleton, The Phoenix, I. 1.

disssemble (di-sem'bl), v.; pret. and pp. disssembled, ppr. disssembling. [< OF. dessembler, dessembler, F. dessembler, be unlike (cf. OF. dessembler, dessembler, dessembler, dessembler, separate, disjoin, divide—opposed to assembler, assemble: see assemble), = Fr. Cat. dessembler = Sp. dessemejar, be unlike, disssemble, = Pg. des- dissemble, dissembler, make unlike, = It. dissimulare, be unlike, differ; these forms (partly < ML. dissimulare, dissimulare, be or make unlike; see dissimulate) being partly mingled with OF. dissimuler, F. dissimuler = Sp. dissimular = Pg. dissimular = It. dissimulare, < L. dissimulare, feign to be different, dissimulate, dissemble, < dissimilis, unlike, < dis- priv. + similis, like; see similar, dissimilar, and assemble, assimilate, assimilate, dissimulate, dissimulate, dissimulate, resemble, seem, etc.] L. trans. 1. To make unlike; cause to look different; disguise.

I'll put it (a gown) on, and I will dissemble myself in 't.
Shak., T. N., iv. 2.

2. To give a false impression about; cause to seem different or non-existent; mask under a false pretense or deceptive manner.

A man must frame some probable cause why he should not do his best, and why he should dissemble his abilities.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 337.

To leave off loving were your better way;
Yet if you will dissemble it, you may.
Dryden, Helen to Paris, I. 149.

The wrongs of the Puritans could neither be dissembled nor excused.
Benson, Hist. U. S., I. 232.

3. To put on the semblance of; simulate; pretend.

Your son Lucentio . . .
Doth love my daughter, and she loveth him,
Or both dissemble deeply their affections.
Shak., T. of the S., iv. 4.

Then it seems you dissemble an aversion to Mankind only in compliance to my Mother's Honour.
Congreve, Way of the World, II. 1.

So like a lion that unheeded lay,
Dissembling sleep, and watchful to betray,
With inward rage he meditates his prey.
